The former communist countries from Central and Eastern Europe had to transpose and implement a vast amount of EU legislation as a condition to join the European Union in 2004.

This book explores the state of compliance with EU directives in the new member states. Using a combination of qualitative and quantitative methods, the book uncovers the complex impact of political preferences, administrative capacity, and policy-making constraints on the timing and timeliness of compliance in Central and Eastern Europe.