There is a growing interest in the role of converts to Islam in Europe and the United States. However, whereas most converts to Islam appear to be women, this fact has been relatively neglected. The ISIM workshop on ‘Gender and Conversion to Islam’, held from 16 to 17 May 2003 in Nijmegen, the Netherlands, was aimed to redress this imbalance by focusing on gender and conversion to Islam in the West. Nine scholars from various countries and different disciplines were invited to compare their research material.

Karin van Nieuwkerk

The workshop ‘Gender and Conversion to Islam’ was opened by Abdulkader Tayob (ISIM Chair at the University of Nijmegen) and Willy Jansen (director of the Centre for Women’s Studies, University of Nijmegen). The convenor of the workshop, Karin van Nieuwkerk (ISIM) gave an introduction to the theme of the workshop. Yvonne Hadadd (Georgetown University) was the first guest speaker. She gave a fascinating outline of the diverse groups active on the Internet and their specific discourses on Islam that are influencing the conversion narratives of female converts. She also offered a historical background to the discourses behind da’wa activities and analysed the present constructions of gender that are produced in the conversion narratives.

Gwendolyn Zoharah Simmons (University of Florida) used her own experiences to contextualize conversion to Islam in America amongst African Americans. She particularly focused on the Nation of Islam (NOI). She traced the attraction of the NOI to black-nationalist sensibilities on the part of the converts, which are a product of their exclusion from mainstream American life. She analysed the gender discourse in the NOI and the subordination of women in the organization. Whereas the traditional strength of black women has been overruled, the Scandinavian case, presented by Anne Sofie Roald (University of Malmo), showed the development of a transcultural Islam in which equal gender opportunities are included. She analysed the developments from the late 1990s onwards as the last stage in the development of a Scandinavian Islam and observed a growing acceptance of cultural diversity in the Muslim community on both a global and local scale. She analysed the creatalization of practice and discourse. New converts first tend to defend traditional gender systems. However, as they go through various stages in the conversion process, there is a tendency to incorporate Scandinavian ideals of gender relations in the Islamic framework. These new Muslims nonetheless diverge from the majority society in embracing concepts of equity rather than equality.

The comparison of online and offline conversion narratives presented by Karin van Nieuwkerk (ISIM) was aimed at understanding the different discourses that could help to understand why Islam can be attractive for women in the West. Besides the biographical narratives, the ethnic, religious, and gender discourses of new Muslims were analysed. Not only the content but also the different contexts in which the narratives were produced—one that is, fieldwork in the Netherlands versus self-written testimonies on the Internet—were compared. Margot Badran (Georgetown University and ISIM) continued with comparative life stories of a small number of female converts from the Netherlands, England, and South Africa. She particularly focused on the Islamic-feminist discourse produced by female converts. Islamic feminism is defined as feminist discourse and practice articulated within an Islamic paradigm and is thus different from notions of gender equity. Islamic feminism derives its understanding from the Qur’an and seeks rights and justice for both men and women. In Badran’s research it became clear that converts are particularly important in articulating Islamic feminist discourses.

Yvonne Haddad (University of Birmingham) brought forward the Sufi paradigm. Sufism has been and continues to be an important agent for conversion to Islam. She outlined how the Sufis’ emphasis on feminine values pertaining to the family and the feminine element in spiritual life has been crucial in attracting Western women to Islam. Stefano Allievi (University of Padua) discussed the shifting significance of the haram/halal frontier. He particularly focused on the hijab, an issue that is symbolically important both outside the community of converts and inside the associative milieu. He also suggested to de-Islamize the approach of conversion to Islam. The so-called ‘Islamic’ discourses pertaining to gender that are attractive to converts are very close to familiar European gender discourses of former generations.

Nicole Bourque (University of Glasgow) added an important dimension to the study of conversion by focusing on discourses and practices of Scottish female converts to Islam. Converting to Islam involves the recreation and renegotiation of religious, national, and gender identity. Yet, the creation of a new Muslim identity also entails the embodiment of this new identity and taking up new bodily practices. After discussing the creating and sustaining of a new identity, the last speaker, Marcia Hermansen (Loyola University, Chicago), addressed the transmission of female Muslim identity in the West. She focused on mothers who converted between 1967 and 1980 and analysed how they raised their daughters as Muslims.

Whereas the case studies revealed the differing patterns and discourses in various countries in Europe and the United States, the focus on gender also allowed for many connections to emerge.

The papers presented and discussed at the workshop will be prepared for publication.