FOR THE YOUTH: JUVENILE DELINQUENCY, COLONIAL CIVIL SOCIETY AND THE LATE COLONIAL STATE IN THE NETHERLANDS INDIES, 1872-1942

Annelieke Dirks
Department of History, Leiden University, The Netherlands
anneliekedirks@gmail.com

The pupils and the re-education officers of the first state reformatory in Semarang, 1918
“FOR THE YOUTH: JUVENILE DELINQUENCY, COLONIAL CIVIL SOCIETY AND THE LATE COLONIAL STATE IN THE NETHERLANDS INDIES, 1872-1942

PROEFSCHRIFT

ter verkrijging van de graad van Doctor aan de Universiteit Leiden op gezag van Rector Magnificus prof.mr. P.F. van der Heijden, volgens besluit van het College voor Promoties te verdedigen op donderdag 23 juni 2011
klokke 15.00 uur

door

Annelieke Dirks

geboren te Aduard
in 1978
Promotores:
Dr. H.W. van den Doel
Dr. A.L. Conklin (The Ohio State University)

Co-promotor:
Dr. M. Bloembergen

Promotiecommissie:
Dr. H. te Velde
Dr. H. Schulte Nordholt
Dr. G.C. Quispel

Copyright © 2010 by Annelieke Dirks
Research in Indonesia was generously funded by the Leids Universitair Fonds (LUF)
See the brotherhood of all mankind as the highest order of Yogis; conquer your own mind, and conquer the world

- Japji Sahib, Pauri 28

Voor mijn geliefde en buitengewoon liefdevolle grootouders Hans en Kings.
CONTENTS

Preface v

Introduction 1
The late colonial state 9
Colonial civil society 11
Colonial histories of youth and childhood 16
Use of terms and concepts 21
Use of sources 25
Outline of the dissertation 28

Part I. A Civil Concern: Juvenile delinquency and re-education in the Netherlands Indies, 1872-1942.

Chapter One
A new society requires new people: the ethical policy and the emergence of ‘modern’ juvenile re-education in the Netherlands Indies, 1872 – 1906 34
1.1. Rescuing, civilizing and controlling: the development of juvenile care in Europe and the Netherlands Indies, 1800-1900 36
1.2. The eighteenth’ century history of child care in the Indies and the changes brought by the ethical policy and the Christian mission around 1900 46
1.3. Christian missionaries and the ethical policy; a marriage of convenience and conviction 60

Chapter Two
World War I, The expansion of colonial civil society and the establishment of the first government institute for juvenile re-education in the Netherlands Indies, 1910-1918 83
2.1. The Dutch colonial state and its cooperation with Christian institutions for juvenile re-education, 1906-1910 85
2.2. The expansion of indigenous civil society around World War I (1914-1918) 97
2.3. Freedom loving ‘criminals’ and the weaknesses of the re-education system 107
2.4. The times are changing: fears of Islam, the search for indigenous allies and the development of juvenile re-education. 115
Chapter Three
Indigenous civil society and Muhammadijah: ideas about youth and (re-)education, 1912-'38

3.1. Indigenous political parties and the importance of education

3.2. Indigenous ideas about youth and future:
   The development of an alternative school system 134

3.3. Muhammadijah and its orphanages: Islamic (re-)education
   140

3.4. Working together: the late colonial state and European and indigenous associations 146

Chapter Four
Civil associations, social pressures and the expansion and decline of reform, 1918-1942

4.1. 1919-1924: A growing number of convicted juveniles and a failing re-education system 161

4.2. Critiquing the Law: Pro Juventute and the development of child laws in the Indies
   179

4.3. 1930-1942: Economic crisis and the increasing importance of civil associations
   188

Part II. Fragments of everyday life: the complexities of childcare and re-education practices in the Netherlands Indies, 1900-1942

Chapter Five
The road to the reformatory: (mis-)communication in the colonial courts between judges, juveniles, and parents

5.1. ‘The lack of mental contact between judge and judiciable’:
   The causes of miscommunication between judges and children 202

5.2. ‘To the best knowledge and in concordance with the law’: mistakes in juvenile verdicts
   212

5.3. The image of parenthood in the communication between parents and the colonial justice system
   219

Chapter Six
‘Civilizing’ in Earnest: re-education facilities and their reform strategies

6.1. Disciplining and improving body and mind
   232

6.2. Specifically colonial aspects of life in the state reformatories 251

6.3. Gendered and ‘racialized’ re-education
   258

Ethnicity and gender in the state reformatories: creating housewives and tradesmen 259
Creating the ‘practical’ indigenous farmer: Pro Juventute Colony, Klakah

6.4. The future of juvenile delinquents

Chapter Seven

Escaping and creating life in state and private institutions, 1905-1942

7.1. Accommodation and resistance in state and private reformatories

7.2. Daily resistance and escape strategies

7.3. Relationships with parents and family

7.4. What is home? Affiliations and the role of religion

Conclusion and Epilogue

Stages of cooperation and dependency

The reform system in crisis

Everyday life and the complexities of the reform system

Juvenile reform: a success or a failure?

Afterthoughts: World War II. A time of rupture and change

Private (Christian) reformatories during and after World War II

From juvenile delinquents to soldiers for independence

Bibliography

Archives and Research Libraries

Interviews

Publications

List of Tables, Graphs, Lists and Images

Samenvatting

Curriculum Vitae
Preface

In February 2009 I drove a light Honda motorcycle from Yogyakarta to Salatiga. I came through endless rice-fields at the foot of one of Java’s active volcanic ranges and was greeted by surprised stares and enthusiastic waves and comments from the locals. White women on motorcycles were apparently not that common in the countryside. Buying gas and food was an adventure in itself, leading to invitations for homemade meals and a chance to practice my rudimentary Indonesian language skills. At the end of the trip waited a visit to one of the reformatories that played a large role in my research: the former White Cross Colony, now called Agrowisata Salib Putih. I arrived without any preparation and before I realized what happened I was brought to one of the oldest buildings on the colony. There it stood, dripping in the rain, with its small windows high-up in the walls: the former prison. It had only two small cells, where most of the juvenile delinquents living on the colony until 1942 had done some time. It was one of those moments where time falls away and you see and feel with different eyes and a different body.

My dear grandmother was born in the Netherlands Indies in 1927. Daughter of white Dutch parents who had come to the colony quite recently, she was part of the privileged classes and enjoyed a carefree childhood until her family’s internment during World War II. I never consciously decided to study colonial history, but somewhere in my subconscious my grandmother’s experiences, stories and love for the country of her childhood must have left their traces. When I first read about juvenile reformatories in the Indies in the summer of 2005 and saw the pictures of the children that lived there, I strongly felt that the story asked to be told and was inspired to do so. I have become the kind of historian that believes in the power of stories and in storytelling. I did my best to connect the small stories of ‘delinquent’ children and their parents to the larger story of colonialism and the development of the colonial state and civil society. The truth, however, is hard to find when we study the past.

This preface offers a chance to speak clearly from the only truth I really know. This is simply the voice of the heart and the soul, something that I have learned to trust more and more over the past four years. Writing my dissertation was not only an academic and intellectual adventure, but also a spiritual one. Seeking historical truth and learning to write history as a discipline, I ended up finding my own truth and developing spiritual discipline. Writing a dissertation, as many of you have experienced, is not a walk in the park. It rather feels like a harrowing climb to the top of a very steep mountain. Doing my Ph.D. was a painful confrontation with the limitations of my own mind. Doubts, insecurities, boredom, lack of motivation and other demons were constant barriers that needed to be taken. On the other side of those walls were the rewards of beautiful archival discoveries and the flow of writing with joy and inspiration. I started looking for ways to make it easier to deal with my own mind and to stay happy during my intellectual crises and under the strain of dissertation stress. Practising and teaching Kundalini yoga and meditation gave me the techniques to steer my mind towards clarity and focus, to hear and be truthful to the voice of my heart and to find a way to live with joy and grace in every circumstance.

As a historian, as a yogi and as a human being I am deeply grateful to the Universe for the chances that were given to me in this lifetime. For the challenges and for the blessings and - most of all - for the people that have shared their knowledge, wisdom, skills and love with me. Most of my friends, colleagues, teachers and students are spread out over the three continents where I have lived: America, Europe and Asia. Some of you have even moved to Africa and Australia! In my mind I imagine a map of the world with thousands of golden lines from each of our hearts to the hearts of the people that are connected with us. I am grateful for each and every one of those golden chords that connects me to all of you. I believe that I do not have to write down your name. You know that I am grateful for what you have given me, for how you have supported this dissertation and my development. It does not matter if our connection is professional or private; it is a golden link nonetheless. Please, I ask you to just take a moment. To sit with your eyes closed, inhale deeply, and feel my gratitude. From my heart to yours. Thank you.