4 Reformed Orthodoxy

The period of Reformed orthodoxy extends from the Reformation to the time that liberal theology became predominant in the European churches and universities. During the period the Lutheran, Reformed, and Anglican churches were the official churches in Protestant countries and religious polemics between Catholicism and Protestantism formed an integral part of the intense political strife that gave birth to modern Europe.

Reformed orthodoxy is usually divided into three periods that represent three different stages; there is no watershed between these periods and it is difficult to determine exact dates. During the period of “early orthodoxy” the confessional and doctrinal codifications of Reformed theology took place. This period is characterized by polemics against the Counter-Reformation; it starts with the death of the second-generation Reformers (around 1565) and ends in the first decades of the seventeenth century. The international Reformed Synod of Dort (1618-1619) is a useful milestone, because this synod codified Reformed soteriology. The second period, called “high orthodoxy,” is the time in which the all-embracing Reformed theological systems were developed; scholasticism became the dominant scholarly method at the Protestant theological faculties in Europe. It is difficult to give an exact date for the end of the second period, but mostly the change of the centuries is taken as the landmark. In the eighteenth century, the period of “late orthodoxy,” the character of orthodoxy changed due to confrontation with the intellectual climate of the early Enlightenment. In this chapter we will focus on the first two periods because they turned out to be the most interesting for the development of the autopistia of Scripture. In the period of late orthodoxy the theological system was mostly reproduced in the hope of maintaining the correct statements of earlier generations. Moreover, it was hard to find examples of the use of term αὐτόπιστος in the representative theological works of this period.

---

1 Muller, PRRD 1\(^2\), 30-32. For the division of early, high, and late orthodoxy, Muller refers to Weber, Grundlagen der Dogmatik 1, 140-148.

2 The termination of the three periods is from W.J. Van Asselt. W.J. Van Asselt and P.L. Rouwendal, eds., Inleiding in de gereformeerd scholastiek, Zoetermeer 1998, 114. At this point Van Asselt does not follow Muller who distinguishes two phases of early orthodoxy (ca. 1565-1618 and 1618-1640). Muller, PRRD 2\(^2\), 94. Cf. Muller, PRRD 1\(^2\), 31, 94.

4 Muller, PRRD 1\(^2\), 84.

5 The term αὐτόπιστος is not used by Bernard De Moor (1709-1780) in his doctrine of Scripture in his extensive commentary on the theological compendium of his teacher John À Marck (1656-1731). B. De Moor, Commentarius perpetuus in Johannis Marckii Compendium theologie Christianae didactico-elencticum, Leiden 1761-1778, 7 vol. He brought nearly all the substantial material together from the major dogmatic works of his predecessors in Utrecht and Leiden. It is called the “tomb monument” of Reformed orthodoxy. Van Asselt and Rouwendal, Inleiding, 150. Αὐτόπιστος is not used by John À Marck either. J. À Marck, Compendium theologiae Christianae didactico elenchticum, 2nd ed., Groningen 1690.
The aim of this study is not to give a complete survey of the use of the term, but to trace its use in the history of Reformed theology and to draw some theological conclusions from the use and meaning of αὐτόπιστος. This cross-section is important, because the autopistia of Scripture is essential for the ongoing quest for certainty in Protestant theology. We have chosen to analyze the use and meaning of the term αὐτόπιστος and its derivatives in the context of four aspects in the theological development:

1. The Reformed concept of the self-convincing character of Scripture was influenced by the developing debate between early Reformed orthodoxy and the Catholicism of the Counter-Reformation. We will look at the use of αὐτόπιστος in this polemical context and especially at the theology of William Whitaker (4.2).

2. During the period of early orthodoxy Reformed theology was institutionalized at the universities; therefore we will study the autopistia of Scripture in the context of this academic education. We will study this aspect from the theology of the Leiden professor Franciscus Junius (4.3). As we will see the terms externum and internum become more and more important in the development of the relationship between autopistia and testimonium; therefore we will discuss the word-pair in a separate paragraph (4.4).

3. The period of high orthodoxy was characterized by increasing internal Protestant polemics. We will trace how αὐτόπιστος was used in the Arminian Controversy (4.5). Another conflict regarded textual criticism and we will study the position of Francis Turretin in this debate (4.6).

4. A change took place in the intellectual sphere; the Enlightenment followed the Renaissance. Reformed orthodoxy was confronted with the rationalism of the early modern philosophers like René Descartes (1596-1650) who took the self-evident proposition ego cogito ergo sum as his methodological starting point. It is not our intention to analyze the tensions between orthodoxy and modernism, but we are curious if the debate with early modernism influenced the Reformed concept of the autopistia of Scripture. For this aspect we will analyze the use of αὐτόπιστος by Gisbert Voetius (4.7).

Before turning to the four above-mentioned aspects, the relationship between Reformation and Reformed orthodoxy will first be discussed (4.1).

4.1 Reformation and Reformed Orthodoxy
The comparison of Reformed orthodoxy with the Reformation often evokes feelings of sympathy for the Reformers and antipathy for their heirs, because their theology is interpreted as a deviation from the Reformation and a return to medieval scholasticism. In recent research the continuity between Reformation and Reformed orthodoxy is more strongly emphasized and Reformed orthodoxy is rehabilitated. The “theory of decline and discontinuity” and the “theory of negative continuity” are rejected by the adherents of the “theory of positive continuity.” In this theory the theology of the Middle Ages, the Reformation, and the Post-Reformation orthodoxy develops progressively and this development is interpreted positively. The Protestant Reformers were influenced by the medieval method of scholasticism from the very beginning, notwithstanding the new theological discoveries; there was a theological and methodological continuity from the fourteenth to the seventeenth century. The advocates of this third theory take the differences between the rhetoric and dialectic style of the Reformation and the static and academic style of orthodoxy and the differences in theological context and literary genre into account. This is a correction of the simplification that presupposed and thus found an antithesis between Calvin and the Calvinists.

---

6 Heim concludes that the historical development of the problem of certainty in Protestant orthodoxy hinges on the autopistia of Scripture. Heim, Das Gewißheitsproblem, 282.

The scheme of the three different theories for the relation between Reformation and Reformed orthodoxy is a simplification, for the question whether continuity or discontinuity is valued as negative or positive is due to the chosen approach to Reformed orthodoxy. For instance the Dutch “Further Reformation” to which many of the Dutch Reformed orthodox theologians belonged, emphasized the practice of piety (praxis pietatis) more strongly than the Reformation. This discontinuity must be interpreted in the light of the emerging international and interconfessional movement of Pietism. If the rise of Pietism is valued positively, this discontinuity with the Reformation can also be valued positively. In the field of spirituality some scholars advocate a “theory of positive discontinuity.”

The newer approach comes forth from a desire to separate the historical and the theological tasks. This is understandable as a reaction to the theological bias in the historical research of dialectical theology, but the distinction of the historical and the theological tasks should not become a separation. This is neither possible nor desirable. In dialectical theology it was clear through which colored glasses Reformed orthodoxy was approached. The theologians of the newer approach also have their own theological

---

7 According to the representatives of the third view, the “theory of decline and discontinuity” interprets orthodoxy as a scholastic deviation from the Reformation and the “theory of negative continuity” acknowledges the scholastic influence in the Reformation, but regrets it. Van Asselt and Rouwendal, Inleiding, 25-28. Cf. Van Asselt and Dekker, Reformation and Scholasticism, 30-32.

8 According to the advocates of the theory of positive continuity, this simplification occurs mainly among the representatives of dialectical theology. The title of an article by Basil Hall often serves as an example. B. Hall, ‘Calvin Against the Calvinists’ in John Calvin, ed. G. E. Duffield, Grand Rapids 1966, 12-37. Cf. Van Asselt and Dekker, Reformation and Scholasticism, 12.

10 According to the representatives of the Nadere Reformatie, the Reformers focussed on the right doctrine due to their context. In the new context the Reformed church became an established church and therefore the focus must be more on spirituality and sanctification. Thus the Further Reformation nuanced the Reformation in a certain sense. Cf. Graafland, Op ‘t Hof, and Van Lieburg ‘Nadere Reformatie,’ 142.

11 Muller, PRRD 2, 24. It is one thing to discover the accommodations of others, but it is another thing to present one’s own view as unaccommodated. Cf. Muller, Unaccommodated Calvin, 4. prejudices; at least they desire to unmask the faults of dialectical theology. It is always safer to be aware of and acknowledge your own theological paradigm, than to deny and conceal it. The emphasis on a positive continuity, however, can become a simplification, because a stress on the differences in context and literary genre easily conceals important theological shifts. In the contextual approach of the representatives of the theory of positive continuity, differences are too easily harmonized and real shifts in the theological position overlooked. Therefore we acknowledge the new perspective on Reformed orthodoxy as a welcome correction of a biased view, but at the same time we will try to weigh the shifts that we find theoretically.

In an hermeneutical study it is impossible to separate the theological task from the historical task. The purpose of our historical research is to listen carefully to the voices of those who have gone before us and to apply what we have found in our historical research for Reformed theology today. This hermeneutical approach does not necessarily lead to a biased view of the history of theology; nevertheless, it remains very important to be clear on this issue and to avoid a hidden agenda. Therefore we will carefully keep in mind the distinction between the historical research and the theological evaluation, but it is not our intention to separate both tasks. We will first turn to the sources and then weigh what we have found in a theological evaluation. The questions that we have formulated in the introduction and in the chapters on Calvin will be helpful to keep on track. Therefore we will focus on the relationship between the authority of the church and the authority of Scripture, the role of the evidences and the relationship between the testimonium of the Spirit and the autopistia of Scripture. First of all, we will give a summary of what can be found on the term αὐτόπιστος in two historical surveys that deal with the period.

4.1.1 Heinrich Heppe

Heinrich Heppe (1820-1879) offered an introduction to the main themes of Reformed orthodoxy in his Dogmatik der evangelisch-reformirten Kirche. This textbook became very influential and both Benjamin B. Warfield and Herman Bavinck used it as a sourcebook. In the school of dialectical theology it was used as the standard survey of Reformed orthodoxy. In 1958 Ernst Bizer (1904-1975) issued a new edition of Heppe’s Dogmatik with an introduction by Karl Barth. The 28 chapters of Heppe’s Dogmatik consist of a summary of the Reformed doctrine and a number of quotations (Belegstellen) from Reformed orthodox authors. Three loci precede the discussion of the existence and knowledge of God; the first is on “Natural and Revealed Theology,” the second on “Holy Scripture,” and the third on “The Foundation of Holy Scripture.” This division of the prolegomena does not flow from the sources; the distinction between natural and revealed theology is not as common for Reformed orthodoxy as Heppe suggests and in the sources a separate locus on the covenant of God as the foundation of 12 H. Heppe, Die Dogmatik der evangelisch-reformierten Kirche dargestellt und aus den Quellen belegt, ed. E. Bizer, Neukirchen 1935. Cf. H. Heppe, Reformed Dogmatics Set Out and Illustrated from the Sources, 2nd ed., ed. E. Bizer, trans. G.T. Thomson, Grand Rapids 1984. It is mainly because of Heppe’s influence that we have chosen to discuss his work, we have also glanced at some other interesting surveys of Reformed orthodoxy such as Althaus, Die Prinzipien der deutschen reformierten Dogmatik. but not found any specific extra information on the term αὐτόπιστος.

Scripture or of the doctrine of Scripture will hardly be found.\(^\text{13}\) The structure of Heppe’s work depends on the sequence in which Theodore Beza dealt with the several loci of theology, but this is not representative for all Reformed theologians.\(^\text{14}\)

The term αὐτόπιστος occurs in Heppe’s survey in the second locus called De scriptura sacra. After stating that Scripture is the only source and norm of all Christian knowledge, Heppe continues with the question of the canon. In one of his Belegstellen he quotes the reasons Guilielmus Bucanus (d. 1603) gives to reject the apocrypha of the Old Testament. They have no canonical authority “(1) because they are not written either by the prophets or by the apostles, and they are not αὐτόπιστοι; (2) in them the ἐνέργεια, force and majesty do not shine forth as in the canonical books.”\(^\text{15}\)

Next Heppe discusses the identification of Scriptura sacra and verbum Dei and the concept of inspiration, interprets both as a deviation from the Reformation and then turns to the attributes of Scripture. In virtue of its auctoritas Scripture is the principium of theology. Heppe refers to the Leiden Synopsis (1625) that calls Scripture “the αὐτόπιστος and irrefragable witness and judge, i.e. its own evidence, by which every controversy raised about divine things should be judged.”\(^\text{16}\) We will turn to the Synopsis later on; the fact that the term is connected with the evidentia leads to the question how the autopistia is related to the evidences. Heppe continues by stating that the divinity and authenticity of Scripture in no wise – not even quoad nos – rests upon the acknowledgement of the church, but simply and solely on Scripture itself “which as God’s Word is αὐτόπιστος and ἀνυπεύθυνος.”\(^\text{17}\) Heppe’s survey also show that sometimes ἀξιόπιστος was used next to or instead of αὐτόπιστος. Heppe refers to Voetius, who says:

As Scripture itself, as the principium externum radiates by its own light, (without the intervening of any other principium or means of demonstration or conviction), is by itself and \(^{13}\) In the index the title of this locus is De fundamento doctrinae scripturae sacrae. In the chapter title the word doctrinae is struck. The difference is significant, for in a certain sense the concept of the covenant can be the foundation of the doctrine of Scripture, from a Reformed orthodox perspective, but certainly not the foundation of Scripture. H. Heppe, Die Dogmatik der evangelisch-reformierten Kirche: dargestellt und aus den Quellen belegt, Elberfeld 1861, [iv], 31. Cf. Heppe, Dogmatik, ed. Bizer, [v], 34, where the same difference occurs.

---

\(^{14}\) The treatment of predestination before creation is not as common as Heppe suggests. Muller, PRRD 1\(^{2}\), 130-131. Cf. Van Asselt and Rouwendal, Inleiding, 20-21.

\(^{15}\) “1) Quia nec a prophetis nec ab apostolis scripti sunt, nec sunt αὐτόπιστοι; 2) nec in ipsis ἐνέργεια, vis et maiestas divini Spiritus elucet, sicut in canonici.” Heppe, Dogmatik, 15. Cf. Heppe, Reformed Dogmatics, 14. Cf. G. Bucanus, Institutiones theologicae seu locorum communivm christianae religiosis, Geneva 1612, iv.8. In the footnotes that refer to Reformed orthodox authors we will sometimes use the subdivision of the author rather than the number of the page or column. Upper case Roman numerals stand for the volumes, lowercase Roman numerals for the chapters and Arabic numerals for the sections; if Roman numerals are absent, a page or column is intended.

\(^{17}\) Heppe, Dogmatik, 10. Cf. Heppe, Reformed Dogmatics, 22. This is from Heppe’s main text; in the Belegstellen he does not give examples of the use of ἀνυπεύθυνος “beyond criticism.”
in itself ἀξιόπιστος or credible – so the Holy Spirit is the internum, supreme, first, independent principium, actually opening and illuminating the eyes of our mind, effectually persuading us of the credible authority of Scripture, from it, along with it and through it, so that being drawn we run, and being passively convicted within we acquiesce.\footnote{Ebenso Voet. (V, 14): Ut enim ipsa scriptura tanquam principium externum proprio lumine radians (nullo alieno interveniente tanquam principio aut medio demonstrationis aut convictionis) per se et in se ἀξιόπιστον seu credibile est, – sic Spiritus S. est internum, supremum, primum, independens principium actualiter mentis nostrae oculos aperiens atque illuminans, et credibilem scripturae auctoritatem ex ea, cum ea, per eundem efficaciter persuadens, sic ut nos tracti curramus et passive in nobis convicti acquiescamus.” Heppe, Dogmatik, 22. Cf. Heppe, Reformed Dogmatics, 25-26. Cf. G. Voetius, Selectae disputationes theologicae, Utrecht 1648-1669, V.ii.2.}

The fact that Voetius uses the expression per se et in se ἀξιόπιστον seu credibile leads to the question if the use of ἀυτόπιστος was declining. It is also important to notice that Voetius calls Scripture a principium externum and the Holy Spirit a principium internum. We will keep this distinction in mind while we study the development of Reformed orthodoxy. Finally Voetius’s use of acquiescere reminds us of Calvin. Heppe continues the discussion of the other attributes of Scripture such as its perfectio, necessitas, and perspicuitas, but the term ἀυτόπιστος does not occur in these paragraphs.

4.1.2 Richard Muller

Richard A. Muller’s Post-Reformation Reformed Dogmatics: The Rise and Development of Reformed Orthodoxy is a four volume survey of the Reformed orthodox prolegomena and of the doctrines of Scripture and of God. We have chosen to discuss Muller next to Heppe because he is the most prominent representative of the abovementioned “theory of positive continuity” and his work functions as a standard for all recent research in the field of Reformed orthodoxy.

Muller criticizes Heppe’s thesis that Reformed orthodoxy moved away from the Reformation emphasis on the Word towards a view of biblical authority grounded on inspiration.\footnote{Muller, PRRD 2\textsuperscript{2}, 89. Heppe’s idea that the Reformed orthodox simply identified Scripture and the Word is also criticized by Muller. Muller, PRRD 2\textsuperscript{2}, 182. Heppe influenced Barth’s evaluation of Reformed orthodoxy as a deviation of the original position of the Reformation, for instance in the idea that the revealed religion is the confirmation of natural religion, according to the Reformed orthodox. Muller, PRRD 1\textsuperscript{2}, 172.} According to Muller, the influence of medieval theology in Reformed orthodoxy is most explicit in the field of the prolegomena. The Reformers did not provide a structural theological model or discuss the meaning of the term theologia; the only theological prolegomena on which the orthodox Reformed theologians could draw back were those of the medieval systems. Following the medieval schools the orthodox theologians identified theology as a science with its own method and foundations (principia).

For the term ἀυτόπιστος Muller refers to Zacharias Ursinus (1534-1583) who “provides a clear definition of the sola Scriptura of the Reformation as ‘Scripture alone is worthy of faith (autopistos) and the rule of faith.’ This is so inasmuch as faith rests on the Word alone and inasmuch as Scripture alone is sufficient for salvation." Muller also explains where the statement that Scripture is the principium unicum of theology comes from:

The early orthodox theologians inherited the preliminary discussion of principia or foundations of theology from the medieval doctors, but they inherited from the Reformers a principal concentration on Scripture as the sole ultimate source of teaching about God. The medieval conception of fundamental doctrines as the principia theologiae gave way to a conception of the source of those doctrines as the principium theologiae or principium unicum theologiae.

The development from the multiple dogmatic principia to the concept of Scripture as principium theologiae had taken place in the work of the Reformed theologians of the last three decades of the sixteenth century like Antoine de la Roche Chandieu (1534-1591), Franciscus Junius (1545-1602), and Sibrandus Lubbertus (1555-1625).

In his paragraph on "The Divinity of Scripture: Authority, Authenticity, and Evidences" Muller concludes that Calvin’s position implies a “balance between the subjective and inward certainty resting on the Spirit and on faith alone and an external objective certainty resting on evidence.” During the era of Reformed orthodoxy this balance became increasingly difficult to maintain and there is “in the writings of the high orthodox era an increasingly apologetic emphasis on the observable or empirical notae divinitatis in the text.”

According to Muller, the definitions of biblical authority offered by the Reformed orthodox lead to a series of related concepts that further characterize the authority of the text and one of these concepts is the autopistia or self-authentication of Scripture. The Reformed orthodox writers place the autopistia of Scripture in the framework of the concept of theology as a science (scientia). Muller refers to Benedict Pictet (1655-1724) who writes: “We ought to consider Scripture, which is the first principle of faith, as we view the principles of other bodies of knowledge, which do not derive their authority from any other source, but are known of themselves and prove themselves.” If Scripture is to be the first principle of theology as a scientia it follows logically that its authority is identified as autopistia.

If Muller is right, this implies a shift compared with the Reformation. For Calvin the Spirit teaches us to find rest in Scripture because it is αὐτόπιστος, and for the Reformed orthodox Scripture is αὐτόπιστος because it is the principium of theology. The 21 Muller, _PRRD_ 2², 95-96.

---

22 Muller, _PRRD_ 2², 160.
23 Muller, _PRRD_ 2², 259. According to Muller, the subjective certainty is necessary to maintain the Reformed emphasis on grace alone but the objective certainty is also necessary to ground the subjective conviction in reality.
24 Muller, _PRRD_ 2², 263.
25 Muller, _PRRD_ 2², 264.
26 Muller, _PRRD_ 2², 265. Cf. B. Pictet, _Theologia christiana_, Geneva 1696, L.viii.3. Cf. Edward Leigh (1602-1671) “As in other Sciences, there are alwaies some principles per se nota & indemonstrabilia, whence other things are proved, so in Divinity all conclusions in point of beleef and practice are proved by the Scripture.” E. Leigh, _A Systeme or Body of Divinity_, London 1654, Lii. Cf. Muller, _PRRD_ 2², 264, n. 177.
differences in style and genre must be taken into account and both statements do not exclude each other, but the shift is evident.

Then Muller turns to the evidences of the divinity of Scripture, with the challenging statement that the continuity of the orthodox position with the Reformation is nowhere clearer than here.\(^\text{27}\) The orthodox Reformed authors hold to the same order and priority of the discussion of the evidences as was found in Calvin’s Institutes. The testimonium remains the primary key to the authority and divinity of Scripture and the evidences flow necessarily from the divine character of Scripture and function as ancillary testimonies to it. Muller does not deal elaborately with the question how the autopistia, the testimonium and the evidences are interrelated in Reformed orthodoxy. Instead he discusses the distinction between the internal or intrinsic evidences that belong to the text of Scripture itself and the external or extrinsic evidences in detail.\(^\text{28}\) His claim that continuity with the Reformation is most clear at this point must be evaluated in the light of the complicated interrelationship of autopistia, testimonium and evidences.

Muller makes some general remarks on this relationship earlier in his work and shows the development in Reformed orthodoxy. In high orthodoxy “the polemic with Rome has become formalized: it is no longer a new battle, but rather a long-established battle with clearly defined lines and even more clearly set answers.”\(^\text{29}\) This influences the relationship between the testimonium and the evidences. Although the testimonium still holds first place in the theological argument for the authority of the text, a relative shift in emphasis to the attributes of Scripture and to the evidences occurs in the writings of many of the high orthodox. Muller interprets this as an evidence of the crisis of theological certainty, caused both by the hermeneutical changes and by the rise of rationalism.\(^\text{30}\)

In Muller’s Dictionary of Latin and Greek Theological Terms αὐτόπιστος is translated as “trustworthy in and of itself.” He explains that “if Scripture is trustworthy in and of itself (in se and per se), no external authority, whether church or tradition, need be invoked in order to ratify Scripture as the norm of faith and practice.”\(^\text{31}\) Muller remarks that the term is often paired with ἀξιόπιστος.

4.1.3 Αὐτόπιστος and Ἀξιόπιστος

In our own research we also often came across the term ἀξιόπιστος next to or instead of αὐτόπιστος. Antoine de la Roche Chandieu in his De Verbo Dei Scripto (1580) discusses the authority of Scripture and says that “theologians should not dispute about their principles, because they are ἀξιόπιστος by themselves, and fixed beyond any risk of

\(^{27}\) Muller, PRRD 2\(^{2}\), 265.

\(^{28}\) Muller, PRRD 2\(^{2}\), 269.

\(^{29}\) Muller, PRRD 2\(^{2}\), 127.

\(^{30}\) Muller, PRRD 2\(^{2}\), 128. Cf. “Although these later orthodox theologians still uniformly assert the basic principle that the historical and empirical evidences of the authority, inspiration, and divinity of Scripture are insufficient to convince the heart without the inward testimony of the Spirit, their expositions of doctrine appeared to give more and more weight to the discussion of historical and empirical evidences.” Muller, PRRD 2\(^{2}\), 147.

\(^{31}\) Muller, Dictionary, 54.
Chandieu pleads for special theological principia and he rejects human reason as a principium of theology. Scripture is the only true principium of theology. In his definition of the principium theologiae Chandieu uses the term αὐτόπιστος:

A theological principium is an indemonstrable and self-convincing axiom (αξιόμα αὐτόδιδακτος & αὐτόπιστος) concerning sacred things, from which, having been posited, a conclusion concerning things that belong to religion follows evidently and necessarily. Of this kind is this axiom: ALL HOLY SCRIPTURE IS ΘΕΟΠΙΝΕΥΣΤΟΣ, which no Christians doubt. This theological principium cannot depend on the authority of the church or on human reason, because it ought to be self-convincing. “Now it must be concluded from what we have said, that the principium theologicum is αὐτόπιστος; it cannot depend on the bare authority of the church nor on human reason.” Chandieu even goes further, for the one principium of theology can be divided into principia and thus Scripture becomes a sourcebook of theological truths. For Chandieu every passage of Scripture gains the status of an axiom, from which conclusions can be drawn. Scripture provides the theologian with statements that function as principles of theology and these statements easily become isolated loqui probantia. For Chandieu the Bible is not a single principium, but the source of theological principia.

In his Tractatus de sacra Scriptura Jerome Zanchi (1516-1590) calls the holy Scriptures the foundation of the whole theology. The context is the discussion with Rome about the authority of the church regarding Scripture. Zanchi uses the example of the sun to illustrate the authority of Scripture. The sun has its light of itself, but our eyes must be opened to see the sun, so Scripture has its authority of itself, but we need the work of the Holy Spirit to open our eyes for it. Some scholars have interpreted this as a deviation from Calvin, but he uses the same example in the Institutes. Zanchi 32 “Theologici non disputant de suis principiis, quippe quae sunt per se δεξιόπιστα, & extra omnem dubitationis alem constitu.” Chandieu, Opera Theologica, 7.

---

34 “Principium autem Theologicum mihi videtur esse Axioma de rebus sacris ἀνεπόδεικτοι & αὐτόπιστοι, quo posito, conclusio de iis quae ad Religionem pertinent, evidens & necessaria consequatur: cuiusmodi est hoc Axioma: SCRIPTURA SACRA TOTA EST ΘΕΟΠΙΝΕΥΣΤΟΣ: de quo nulli Christiani dubitant.” Chandieu, Opera Theologica, 9-10.

35 “Nunc autem ex iis quae diximus colligitur Principium Theologicum esse αὐτόπιστον, nec esse petendum ex nuda Ecclesiae auctoritate, neque ex humana ratione.” Chandieu, Opera Theologica, 11.

36 “Nullus est enim locus qui non conficiat conclusionem primariam, & ipsi loci habent vim summij axiomatis.” Chandieu, Opera Theologica, 14.

37 Sinnema, ‘Antoine De Chandieu’s Call,’ 177, 189-190.

39 Zanchius, Opera Theologica 8, 333.

40 According to W. Neuser, the example implies a division of the light of the sun and the eye. “Durch die Unterscheidung des Sonnenlichtes vom Sehorgan ist im Gleichnis die Zusammengehörigkeit von Schrift und Geist aufgelöst; bei Calvin sind beide noch ungetrennt.” Neuser, ‘Dogma und Bekenntnis in der Reformation,’ 316. Neuser depends on Heim, continues: “The church after all has not given the Scripture this dignity, to be ἀξιόπιστος by itself and authentic.” Instead of ἀυτόπιστος Zanchi uses the expression per se ἀξιόπιστος.

In Lutheran orthodoxy the terms ἀυτόπιστος and ἀξιόπιστος are also used together. Abraham Calov (1612-1686) says: “Every Word of God is ἀξιόπιστος and ἀυτόπιστος and must be believed per se simply because it is the Word of God, because God has declared it and said it, even though our reason may not understand or grasp it.”

There is a difference between the two terms, for Scripture can be worthy of our faith for many other reasons, while ἀυτόπιστος expresses the self-convincing authority of Scripture. The addition of per se or in se, however, gives ἀξιόπιστος the same meaning as ἀυτόπιστος.

4.1.4 The Dictionaries

The dictionary entries of the term ἀυτόπιστος in this period show a complicated picture. As we have seen the important Thesaurus linguæ graecæ (1572) of Henry Estienne gives the definition “Per se probabilis seu credibilis, Cui per se fides adhibetur, sine argumentis.” This dictionary remained influential for centuries. The ancient meaning of the term was still current in the seventeenth century, as the second edition of the Lexicon philosophicum terminorum philosophis usitatorum (1662) of Johannes Micraelius (1579-1658) shows, where ἀυτόπιστος refers to an “indemonstrable principium of such excellence and dignity, that it gains faith through itself.” William Robertson (d. 1686), a philosopher and linguist, gave the following definition in his Thesaurus Graecæ Linguæ (1676): “Ἀὐτόπιστος: producing faith without arguments: ἀυτόπιστον, credible of itself, knowable of itself (per se notum).” The Dutch philologist Cornelius Schrevelius (1615-1661) published a Lexicon manuale Graeco-Latinum et Latino-Graecum; it does not have an entry for ἀυτόπιστος. A later edition of the Lexicon Gewißheitsproblem, 293-294. Cf. Calvin, Institutes, 3.2.34, OS 4, 45 and Calvin, Institutes, 2.2.21, OS 3, 264.

---

41 “Ecclesia enim nunquam dedit Scripturæ hanc dignitatem, ut esset per se ἀξιόπιστος & ἀνθυμιακα.” Zanchius, Opera Theologica 8, 344. Cf. “Scriptura sacra, quam habet in se autoritate, hoc est dignitatem & vim, qua in se est ἀξιόπιστος: eam non habet ab Ecclesia sed a Deo.” Zanchius, Opera Theologica 8, 339. The use of dignitas can point to the axiomatic character of Scripture, for dignitas is a Latin translation of ἁξιόμα.

44 “Ἀὐτόπιστος: per se fidelm faciens sine argumentis: ἀυτόπιστον, per se credibile, per se notum.” W. Robertson, Thesaurus Graecæ Linguæ in epitomen: sive Compendium redactus et alphabetice secundum Constantini methodum et Schrevelii referatus, Cambridge 1676.

45 At least not in the edition of 1682 printed in Amsterdam; I have not checked previous editions. C. Schrevelius, Lexicon manuale Graeco-Latinum et Latino-Graecum, Amsterdam 1682. The Lexicon Graeco-Latinum et Latino Graecum of Johann Caspar Suicer (1620-1684), a professor at Zurich, also does not have the lemma ἀυτόπιστος. J.C. Suicer, Lexicon Graeco-Latinum, et Latino-Graecum, summa cura elaboratum, Tuguri [Zurich] 1683.
manuale edited by Joseph Hill (1625-1707) and published in Amsterdam (1709) does have the entry and gives the same definition as Robertson in his Thesaurus.\textsuperscript{46} Maybe the several dictionaries copied each other or were compiled from the same sources.

If we compare these results with those of the sixteenth-century dictionaries, the early definition of Budé \textit{per se fidem faciens sine argumentis} remarkably still occurs twice. In the seventeenth century, however, the definition \textit{per se notum} is given next to \textit{per se credibile} and the term is expressly connected with \textit{principium}. These differences may indicate a development in its use.

4.1.5 Piscator’s Summary of the Institutes

We will close this introduction to Reformed orthodoxy by taking a glance at the summary of Calvin’s Institutes given by Johannes Piscator (1546-1625), professor of theology at Strasburg and Heidelberg. The \textit{Aphorismi doctrinae christianae, ex Institutione Calvini exerpti} was first published in 1589. Piscator writes: “Although this Scripture deserves faith from all as \textit{θεόπνευστος} and \textit{αὐτόπιστος}, still the Holy Spirit must sanctify it in our hearts to establish its authority as certain to us so that we also may have full faith in it.”\textsuperscript{47} This is a shift of emphasis; Calvin says that those whom the Holy Spirit has inwardly taught, truly find rest in Scripture that is \textit{αὐτόπιστος}, while it still owes the certainty that it deserves among us (\textit{meretur apud nos certitudinem}) to the testimony of the Spirit. As we have seen for Calvin \textit{αὐτόπιστος} characterizes the authority of Scripture for believers; it refers to the intrinsic \textit{maiestas} of Scripture that is only discerned by faith through the \textit{testimonium} of the Spirit. Piscator says that Scripture deserves faith from all and connects the term \textit{αὐτόπιστος} with this faith that Scripture deserves. Probably Piscator was led to this exegesis by the following sentence in the Institutes that stems from the 1539 edition where Calvin says that although Scripture gains reverence for itself by its own majesty, still it only then really impresses us seriously when it is sealed by the Spirit to our hearts.\textsuperscript{48} But as we have seen, in 1539 Calvin referred to believers who are overwhelmed by the \textit{maiestas} of God in Scripture. In Piscator’s summary the \textit{autopistia} of Scripture shifts from believers to all people and from the realm of trust to the realm of truth; the \textit{testimonium} is a surplus for believers.\textsuperscript{49}

A few remarks can already be made from this first impression of Reformed orthodoxy:

\textsuperscript{46} “\textit{Αὐτόπιστος, per se fidem faciens sine argumentis αὐτόπιστος, per se credibile, per se notum},” J. Hill, \textit{Cornelii Schrevelii Lexicon manuale Graeco-Latinum}, Amsterdam 1709, 114.
\textsuperscript{47} “Etsi autem haec scriptura fidem apud omnes meretur tanquam \textit{θεόπνευστος} καὶ \textit{αὐτόπιστος}, tamen testimonio Spiritus sancti sancti in cordibus nostris oportet, ut nobis certa ejus constet authoritas, ac proinde ut plenum ei fidem habeamus.” J. Piscator, \textit{Aphorismi doctrinae christianae, maximam partem ex Institutione Calvini exerpti; sive loci communes theologici, brevibus sententiis expositi}, 10th ed., Herborn 1626, 18-19.
\textsuperscript{48} “et si enim reverentiam sua sibi ultero maiestate conciliat, tunc tamen denuo serio nos afficit, quum per Spiritum obsignata est cordibus nostris.” \textit{OS} 3, 70. Cf. Calvin, Battles, \textit{Institutes}, 80.
1. It is clear that the term ἀὐτόπιστος is still used in Reformed orthodoxy to define Scripture, yet there seems to be a shift in the interpretation of the term as Piscator’s summary of the Institutes shows.

2. Other Greek terms like ἀξίοπιστος and ἀνυπεύθυνος are used next to it or instead of it; although the meaning of these terms is different, yet they are used as synonyms especially when per se or in se is added.

3. The term seems to be related to the canonicity and authenticity of Scripture given with its prophetic and apostolic origin.

4. ἀὐτόπιστος is connected with Scripture as a principium of theology; for Chandieu Scripture is a source of theological principia. In the dictionaries we have found the Latin definition per se notum to define the term ἀὐτόπιστος. The autopistia of Scripture seems to follow logically from the fact that Scripture is the first principle of theology. It is also remarkable to find the distinction between Scripture as the principium externum and the Holy Spirit as the principium internum of theology.

5. The example of the light of the sun is used to explain the autopistia of Scripture; this example leads to further thoughts on sin as blindness and on the illumination of the Spirit as the taking away of the blindness; in essence these examples go back to Calvin.

4.2 William Whitaker (1547-1595)

Now we will turn to the influence of the debate with Catholicism on the Reformed orthodox concept of the authority of Scripture. One of the main representatives of the Counter-Reformation was Robert Bellarmine SJ (1542-1621), whose Disputationes de controversiis christianae fidei adversus huius temporis haereticos (1586) elicited more than 200 reactions from Lutheran and Reformed sides.\(^{50}\) One of the Reformed reactions came from William Whitaker, a professor at Cambridge and a leading theologian of the Elizabethan Church who was deeply involved in the polemics on the authority of Scripture with Counter-Reformation theologians. We have chosen Whitaker as the representative of early Reformed orthodoxy to examine the possible influence of the debate with the Counter-Reformation on the concept of the autopistia of Scripture. Whitaker not only wrote against Bellarmine but also against the Louvain professor Thomas Stapleton (1535-1598), a fellow Englishman. Stapleton held an extreme position within Roman Catholicism, because he explicitly said that the authority of the church was greater than the authority of Scripture.\(^{51}\)

In the Church of England Whitaker strove for the Calvinistic cause. To establish the doctrine of predestination more officially in the Church of England he drew up the Lambeth Articles as an addition to the Thirty-nine Articles.\(^{52}\) He agreed with Calvin on \(^{51}\) G.H. Tavard, Holy Writ or Holy Church: The Crisis of the Protestant Reformation, New York [1959], 231. According to Tavard, Stapleton stood alone among the Catholics at this point.

---

\(^{52}\) This was just before his death in 1595; the articles never gained confessional authority in the Church of England. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom 1, 658. For the text of the Lambeth Articles cf. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom 3, 523-525.
all main points of doctrine, except the relationship between church and state. Theological debate between the Counter-Reformation and Protestantism was the intellectual side of a political conflict. On the Continent theological institutes were erected to train Roman Catholic Englishmen for missionary work as priests in England. The government urged Whitaker and his colleagues to make propaganda for the Protestant cause and give a scholarly theological answer to the sophisticated critique of the Jesuits. Polemical theology was of such political importance that spies laid their hands on Bellarmine’s lecture notes and handed them over to Whitaker so that he could discuss the ideas of Bellarmine even before his lectures were published.

In 1588 Whitaker wrote his Disputatio de Sacra Scriptura. He intended to deal with all the controversial subjects in a series of disputations, of which this was the first, but he never accomplished the whole series. He chose the three offices of Christ to classify his disputations, because he believed that all the heresies of Rome concerned the offices and merits of Christ. Under the prophetic office of Christ Whitaker dealt with the Scriptures, under the royal office he placed the church, and under the priestly office the mediation of Christ and the sacraments. This classification remained quite unique in Reformed orthodoxy, although the work was of great influence. For Whitaker the authority of Scripture belonged to Christology and more specifically to the prophetic office of Christ.

---

57 This was only the first part of his structure. After the offices of Christ he intended to deal with the benefits of Christ, and with the person of Christ. The controversies that he had in mind were the soteriology and the Christology. Cf. F.G.M. Broeyer, William Whitaker (1548-1595): Leven en werk van een anglocalvinistisch theoloog, Utrecht [1982], 126-127.

58 At the publication of Petrus Van Mastricht’s Theoretico-practica theologia (1682-1687) it was still recognized as a definitive work. Muller, PRRD 2, 108.

59 Bellarmine took the Apostolic Creed as matrix for his theological structure and, according to Whitaker, he had reduced all the controversies to three articles of the creed: faith in the Catholic Church, the communion of saints, and the forgiveness of sins. W. Whitaker, Opera Theologica, duobus tomis nunc primum collecta: subiuncta est ad primi tomi finem, de auctoris vita & morte descriptio, Geneva 1610, vol. 1, 258. Cf. Whitaker, Disputation, 22.
In early Reformed orthodoxy the authority of Scripture was not exclusively discussed in the prolegomena. Robert Rollock (1555-1599) discusses the authority and autopistia of Scripture in the context of soteriology in his Treatise of God’s Effectual Calling (1597). In this book the covenant forms a key for arranging and tying together all the subjects of Reformed theology; Rollock also discusses Scripture as part of pneumatology. Rollock writes in English, but a Latin note in the margin says: “Scriptura est αὐτόπιστος.” In the main text he writes:

We have no need simply of any other light, or of any one special evidence to demonstrate to this matter, but that very light which is in the Scripture. For the Scripture (being the first and immediate Word of God) is of authority sufficient in itself, and so likewise of itself most clear and evident, and the only cause of all that light which is in the church and in the hearts of men. For like as the light of the sun is not perceived nor to be seen by means of any other light, for that it so far exceeds all other bodily and external light, so, that spiritual light of the Scripture hath no need in itself of any other light to set forth the same.\(^{60}\)

In his Medulla theologiae William Ames’s (1576-1633) does not discuss the authority of Scripture at the beginning of his survey, but as a part of his ecclesiology.\(^{61}\) The term αὐτόπιστος does not occur in this work. The examples of Whitaker, Ames, and Rollock show that Calvin’s decision to discuss Scripture in the introduction of the Institutes was not always followed. The place of the autopistia of Scripture in Reformed theology begs for further theological consideration.

4.2.1 The Authority and Αὐτόπιστία of Scripture

In the Disputatio Whitaker discusses most of the controversial points with Rome regarding Scripture. In six scholastic quaestiones he deals with (1) the number of canonical books, (2) the Hebrew and Greek originals as the only authentic version of Scripture, (3) the authority of Scripture based on the testimony of the Spirit rather than on the authority of the church, (4) the perspicuity of Scripture sufficient for our salvation, (5) the proper interpretation of Scripture, and (6) the perfection of Scripture over against human traditions. He criticizes the idea that Scripture is only partly the regula fidei of the church.\(^{62}\) He rejects the fourfold interpretation of Scripture and emphasizes the interpretation of Scripture by Scripture.\(^{63}\) Whitaker adheres to the infallibility of Scripture; with a reference to Augustine he rejects the idea that the authors of Scripture could err.\(^{64}\) In the third quaestio he deals with the most central theme of the book, the relationship between the authority of Scripture and the church. According to Whitaker, this is the most fundamental issue between Reformation and 60 R. Rollock, Select Works: Reprinted from the Original Editions, ed. W. M. Gunn, vol. 1, Edinburgh 1844, 68. This reminds us of the remarks by Zanchi on the example of the sun to explain the relationship of Word and Spirit, but here the self-convincing character of light is emphasized.

---

61 G. Ames, Medulla theologica, Amsterdam 1659. These examples show that the presentation of Reformed orthodoxy in several loci by Heppe is a simplification.

Rome; both sides agree that the Scriptures have authority, but they disagree about the final basis of this authority.

The question, therefore, between us and the papists is, from where they have received such great authority and what it is, and on what this whole weight of such divine dignity and authority depends. The subject is difficult and complicated and I really do not know whether there is any other controversy between us of greater importance.65

Whitaker deals with the objections of Thomas Stapleton against the Reformed position step by step. Bellarmine had only discussed this fundamental issue in passing, but Stapleton had written on the subject in his Principiorum Fidei Doctrinalium Demonstratio Methodica.66 Quoting Stapleton, Whitaker summarizes the Roman Catholic position: “The Scriptures are in themselves (in se) worthy of all reverence, but with regard to us (quoad nos), they would not by themselves (per se) have been held in such honor.”67 The final basis for the authority of Scripture for us is the authority of the church. It is exactly this point that Whitaker objects to in his third quaestio; for him the authority of Scripture is independent of the authority of the church not only in itself, but also with regard to us. Whitaker disagrees with Rome on the final ground of certainty in the Christian faith. It is either the church through which we believe Scripture or it is Scripture through which we believe the church.68

Stapleton and Whitaker disagreed fundamentally on the authority of Scripture, but they did not disagree on the importance of the issue. Leaving the other five quaestiones untouched, Stapleton found the third quaestio important enough to answer extensively. According to the general custom among the controversy-theologians, he copied the whole Disputatio and responded to it piece by piece in his Defensio Authoritatis ecclesiasticae circa S. Scripturarum.69 Whitaker on his turn copied the whole work of Stapleton, including his own text and answered Stapleton piece by piece in a so-called Duplicatio. Whitaker blamed Stapleton of being too copious, but his own final text was

67 “Omni enim reverentia (inquit) scripturae in se dignae sunt, non autem quoad nos in tanto honore per se habentur.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 1, 314b. Cf. Whitaker, Disputation, 277. This is a loose quotation. Cf. T. Stapleton, Opera quae extant omnia, ed. H. Hollandus, Paris 1620, vol 1, 311. “Illud enim Scripturae sacrae reverentiam considerat, ut in seipsa es; & hoc eadem considerat quoad nos, de qua re postea.”
68 “The central issue in the debate between Whitaker and his opponents about the Holy Scripture was whether belief in the truths of revelation required the authority of the Church in order to acknowledge them obediently.” Broeyer, ‘Traces of the Rise of Reformed Scholasticism,’ 164. Cf. Tavard who regrets the loss of the unity of Word and Church. Up to the Middle Ages “Holy Writ and Holy Church are mutually inclusive.” Tavard, Holy Writ or Holy Church, 244.
twenty-five times as large as the original text of the third quaestio in the Disputatio.

Stapleton’s final response, his Triplicatio, was published after Whitaker’s death and only dealt with a few subjects of the controversy; Stapleton reasserted that the determination of the canon depends on the church and explained why the testimony of the church was necessary to accept the authority of Scripture.

The fact that the authority of Scripture was the central issue in this debate is proved by the subtitle of Whitaker’s Duplicatio, which reads: Pro Authoritate atque Autopistia Sacrae Scripturae. The term autopistos is so important for Whitaker that he uses it to define his position on the authority of Scripture; authoritas and autopistia are inseparable. We will have to examine the use of autopistos both in the Disputatio and the Duplicatio to see how the authority of Scripture is connected to its autopistia; and if the use of the substantive instead of the adjective indicates a shift in the meaning of the term. Self-convincingness has now become one of the attributes of Scripture just like perspicuitas or sufficientia.

Whitaker uses the term autopistos three times in his Disputatio. In the Duplicatio Whitaker uses the term more frequently and in a broader sense, for instance calling the preaching of Christ autopistos in contrast with the preaching of the church. In another place he says: “Even if the church were autopistos, then it does not follow that the Scriptures are sealed only by the testimony of the church, for the Scriptures themselves are autopistoi. “

4.2.2 The Evidences

The evidences do not occupy a large place in Whitaker’s polemics. In the Disputatio he mentions them in passing while he is answering the Roman Catholic objections.

---

71 In the Triplicatio Stapleton responded to Whitaker’s answer to the paragraphs 1.1, 1.13 and 2.6 of the Defensio. Cf. H. Schützeichel, Wesen und Gegenstand der kirchlichen Lehrautorität nach Thomas Stapleton: ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Kontroverstheologie im 16. Jahrhundert, Trier 1966, 31, n. 5. The terms duplicatio and triplicatio originate from Roman law, where a plaintiff could bring his actio and a defendant respond with his exceptio. The plaintiff could reply with a replicatio, which in turn might be met with a duplicatio and in exceptional cases the pleadings might advance to a triplicatio and a quadruplicatio. Cf. G. Long, ‘Actio,’ in W. Smith (ed.), A Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities, London 1875, 9-13.

Whitaker faces the question how to persuade persons that do not acknowledge the authority of any book of the Bible, without the church. He answers that such infidels will also reject the authority of the church and that the evidences gathered from the Bible have more weight then the authority of the church. “I speak not now of the internal testimony of the Spirit (internum Spiritus testimonium), but of certain external testimonies, which may be drawn from the books themselves, to prove them divinely inspired writings.” Then he mentions eight evidences, largely following Calvin’s Institutes. He says that (1) the majesty of the doctrine of Scripture surpasses all human writings; (2) Scripture is written in a simple, pure, and divine style; (3) the books of Moses are more ancient then any other writings; (4) the oracles or prophesies are very exact for example the names given to persons ages before their birth; (5) the miracles confirm the authority of Scripture; (6) the enemies of Scripture have never been able to destroy it; (7) the martyrs have sealed the doctrine of Scripture by their blood and (8) the books are not written by previously qualified authors. Still all these evidences are completely insufficient unless the testimony of the Spirit “fills our minds with a wonderful plenitude of assurance, confirms them, and causes us most gladly to embrace the Scriptures, giving force to the preceding arguments.” Whitaker connects the evidences with the testimonium, by saying that the testimonium gives power (vis) to the evidences. Whitaker distinguishes between the urging and constraining (cogere and premere) force of the arguments and the persuading force (persuadere) of the testimonium. The testimonium remains the pivot on which the authority of Scripture hinges. Some object that the testimonium is external and not inherent in the Word, because it is not drawn from the Bible, but Whitaker answers:

Although the testimony of the Holy Spirit is not the same as the books themselves; still it is not external (non externum), separate or alien from the books, because it is received from the doctrine (doctrina) delivered in those books; for we do not speak of any enthusiastic influence of the Spirit.

The testimonium internum of the Spirit is so strongly related to Scripture that it is called non externum because it is found in Scripture itself; the testimonium is received from the doctrina of Scripture. Thus internum not only refers to “in the heart,” but also to “in Scripture.”

---

75 “Non loquor iam de interno Spiritus testimonio, sed de externis quibusdam testimoniiis, quae ex ipsis libris desumi possunt, quibus scripturas ipsas divinas esse intelligamus.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 1, 318b. Cf. Whitaker, Disputation, 293.
76 Whitaker, Opera Theologica 1, 318b. Cf. Whitaker, Disputation, 294.
80 “Respondeo: Etsi quidem Spiritus sancti testimonium non sit idem, quod ipsi libri; externum tamen non est, nec ab ipsis libris seiuscetum & alienum, quia percipitur ex doctrina, quae in ipsis libris traditur: non enim Spiritum aliquem ἐνθουσιαστικῶν intelligimus.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 1, 319a. Cf. Whitaker, Disputation, 295.
Whitaker deals with Augustine’s Ego vero Evangelio non crederem, nisi me catholicae Ecclesiae commoveret auctoritas and agrees with Calvin’s interpretation. Even if believers are moved (commovere) by the authority of the church to receive the gospel, it does not follow that their “intimate inward persuasion” is produced in the same way. “To be moved is one thing, to be persuaded is another.”81 The testimony of the church can only urge (cogere) and not persuade (persuadere). “It is one thing to force men to acknowledge the Scriptures, and quite another to persuade them of their truth.”82

4.2.3 The Vulgate and the Septuagint
Whitaker uses the term αὐτόπιστος for the first time in his Disputatio in the second quaestio; the issue is the claim of the Council of Trent that the Vulgate is the authentic version of Scripture.83 “Our churches, on the contrary, determine that this Latin edition is very generally and miserably corrupt, is false and not authentic; and that the Hebrew edition of the Old and the Greek of the New Testament are the real and authentic Scripture of God.”84 Whitaker responds to Bellarmine, who argued that the Vulgate had been used for more than a thousand years and that it was fit for the Latin Church to have the authentic version of Scripture in its own language. According to Whitaker, a translation can never be authentic in itself.

For translations of Scripture are always to be brought back to the originals of Scripture, received if they agree with those originals and corrected if they do not. That Scripture only, which the prophets, apostles, and evangelists wrote θεοπνευστῶς, is in every way αὐτόπιστος & αὐθεντική.85

The term αὐτόπιστος is a synonym of authentic; it is not used to express the self-convincing character of Scripture, but to safeguard the originals. Whitaker uses the term αὐτόπιστος to express their ultimate authority. Behind the translations stands the original, therefore the translation cannot be αὐτόπιστος, the highest authority. The term gains a specific meaning in the context of the relationship between the original text and the translations of Scripture. Whitaker does not deal with textual criticism, but he trusts

---

81 “Aliud autem est commoveri, aliud persuaderi.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 1, 325a. Cf. Whitaker, Disputation, 322.
83 Whitaker, Opera Theologica 1, 278a. Cf. Whitaker, Disputation, 110-111.
84 “Nostrae contra Ecclesiae hanc Latinam esse passim & misere corruptam, esse falsam, non esse authenticam: Hebraicum vero veteris, & Graecam novi Testamenti sinceram & authenticam Dei scripturam statuunt.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 1, 278a. Cf. Whitaker, Disputation, 111.
85 “Semper enim Translationes Scripturarum ad primos Scripturarum fontes reuocanda sunt, & si cum illis congruant, recipienda: si discrepant, corrigenda. Illa duntaxat Scriptura, quam Prophetae, Apostoli, atque Evangelistae, θεοπνευστῶς consipserunt, est omni modo αὐτόπιστος & αὐθεντική,“ Whitaker, Opera Theologica 1, 283b. Cf. Whitaker, Disputation, 138.
that we now have the very ancient scriptures of Moses and the other prophets, although we might not have exactly the same forms and shapes of the letters.\textsuperscript{86}

In this context Whitaker also discusses the authority of the Septuagint. He acknowledges that Augustine and other church fathers held it in high esteem, but denies that it stands on the same level as the original Hebrew text.\textsuperscript{87} The Roman Catholic emphasis of this authority rested on the supposed miraculous agreement of the seventy-two translators and on the normative use of the Septuagint in the New Testament. Whitaker deals with the first argument, rejecting Bellarime’s suggestion that the translators of the Septuagint were prophets, but not with the second argument.\textsuperscript{88}

The Roman Catholic appeal to the Septuagint to argue for the authority of the Vulgate and the apocrypha may have led to a rejection of the authority of the Septuagint in Reformed orthodoxy and may have complicated its use for textual criticism. Further study of this point may be interesting.

\textbf{4.2.4 The Status Controversiae}

The second time Whitaker uses the term is in the introduction to the third \textit{quaestio}. Here he defines the \textit{status controversiae} that has to be discussed. Whitaker does not despise the testimony of the church concerning the Scriptures, but he does not want to make its authority depend on the church. The internal testimony of the Holy Spirit (\textit{testimonium internum Spiritus sancti}) more certainly persuades us that these books are sacred.\textsuperscript{89}

Whitaker explains how this \textit{testimonium} is related to the authority of Scripture:

\begin{quote}
The sum of our opinion is, that Scripture is \textit{auvtóπιστος}, that is, it has all its authority and credibility from itself; that it must be acknowledged and received, not so much because the church has determined and commanded this, but because it comes from God; and that we certainly know that it comes from God, not from the church but by the Holy Spirit.\textsuperscript{90}
\end{quote}

For Whitaker \textit{auvtóπιστος} means that Scripture has all its \textit{authoritas} and \textit{fides} from itself (\textit{ex se}). This self-convincing character of Scripture belongs to his \textit{summa sententiae}; in scholastic jargon this is the principal point of the disputation. But how are \textit{testimonium} and \textit{auvtóπιστος} related to each other? Whitaker says three things: (1) Scripture is \textit{auvtóπιστος}, (2) it must be accepted because it comes from God, and (3) we know this through the Spirit. The Spirit gives believers the knowledge of the divine origin of Scripture; through the Spirit Scripture is not only \textit{auvtóπιστος} in itself, but also for us (\textit{quoad nos}).

In his \textit{Defensio} Stapleton does not seem to have any difficulty with the term \textit{auvtóπιστος}; he answers Whitaker’s remark that Scripture is “\textit{ex se auvtóπιστον}” with the comment that every dogma of the faith and every revealed truth is true of itself and does not become true when it is proclaimed, but Stapleton does not quote Whitaker

\textsuperscript{87} Whitaker, \textit{Opera Theologica} 1, 279b. Cf. Whitaker, \textit{Disputation}, 120.

\textsuperscript{88} The reference to Jerome who called the seventy “interpreters” and not “prophets” was quite common in Reformed orthodoxy. Muller, \textit{PRRD} 2\textsuperscript{2}, 432.

\textsuperscript{90} “\textit{Summa nostrae sententiae est, esse scripturam auvtóπιστον, id est ex se suam omnem authoritatem & fidem habere; esse agnoscedam, esse recipiendum, non tantum quia Ecclesia sic statuit & iussit, sed quia a Deo prodiit: prodisse autem a Deo, non ab Ecclesia, sed ex Spiritu sancto, certo intelligi.” Whitaker, \textit{Opera Theologica} 1, 315a. Whitaker, \textit{Disputation}, 279-280.
accurately and interprets ἀὐτόπιστος as “true from itself” instead of “convincing or credible of itself.” Perhaps Stapleton did not know the meaning of the term ἀὐτόπιστος. In his Duplicatio Whitaker exposes this misinterpretation; the unnecessary addition of ex se shows that Stapleton does not know what ἀὐτόπιστος means. “You really do not know what the meaning of this word is, or you pretend not to know. [...] For ἀὐτόπιστος means not only that something is true of itself, but that it does not stand in need of an argument, by which it is confirmed or of a demonstration.” In the margin Whitaker refers to Proclus’s commentary on Euclid’s Elements. This reference to Proclus is striking; for it is an indication that Whitaker connected the theological term to the philosophical text of Proclus on Euclid. In that case Proclus may have influenced the use of ἀὐτόπιστος in the Reformation as well, although this reference at the end of the sixteenth century does not prove that Proclus was the source of the term for Calvin and Bullinger. “I have called Scripture ἀὐτόπιστος, just like a philosopher calls a definition ἀὐτόπιστος when it does not need a proof.” The reference shows that Whitaker was familiar with the original philosophical meaning of ἀὐτόπιστος. In his Duplicatio he says that the Scriptures can be compared with the principia in the sciences:

Those things are self-convincing and undemonstrable (ἀὐτόπιστος καὶ ἀναπόδεικτος), that do not require external proofs and from which other things are proved evidently (per se notis) and clearly. Just as the arts (artes) depend on their principles (principia), from which all things are proved while they stand through themselves, so the religion of all Christians depends on the Holy Scriptures and unless they are certain by themselves (per se certae), the religion must vacillate.

91 “Taceo quod his ais ‘scripturam ex se esse ἀὐτόπιστον’, quum illud cuiubet dogmati fidei, cuiubet revelatae veritati commune sit, quod ex se fidem habeat, id est ex se vera sit, non ex authoritate praedicantis veritatem accipiat, de quo etiam iam multa diximus.” Stapleton, Opera Omnia 1, 862. Cf. Whitaker, Opera Theologica 2, 17b.

92 In a quotation from Calvin’s Institutes in his Principiorum Fidei Demonstratio Stapleton leaves the term ἀὐτόπιστος away. “Manea igitur hoc fixum, Scripturam quidem ipsam demonstrationi & rationibus subiici fas non esse: quam tamen apud nos meretur certitudinem Spiritus testimonio consequi.” Stapleton, Opera Omnia 1, 312. In the Triplexatio he gives the exact quotation. Stapleton, Opera Omnia 1, 1120.

93 “Namqui scripturam ἀὐτόπιστον vocat, non illi opus est illud ‘ex se’ addere. Si enim ἀὐτόπιστος sit, ex se fidem atque authoritatem habet. Tu vero aut nescis quae vis verbi huius sit, aut te nescire similis. [...] Nam ἀὐτόπιστον est, non modo quod ex se verum est, sed quod argumentum, quo confirmatur, aut demonstrationem non desiderat.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 2, 18b.

94 “Proclus in tertio Euclid.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 2, 18b.

95 “Sic igitur ἀὐτόπιστον Scripturam dixi, ut philosophus ἀρχηγοῦ vocat ἀὐτόπιστον, quae probationem non requirit, quaeque ob eam causam apistos quoque appellatur, cum demonstrari nequeat.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 2, 18b.

96 “Sunt autem quaedam ἀὐτόπιστα atque ἀναπόδεικτα, quae probationes externas non requirunt, ex quibus per se notis ac manifestis caetera probantur. Quemadmodum autem artes suis principiis nituntur, ex iisque probantur omnia, ipsa per se consistunt: sic religio omnis Christianorum ex sacris scripturis pendet, quae nisi per se certae sint, religio vacillet necesse est.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 2, 93b. Whitaker sometimes refers to Aquinas, but it is not clear if Whitaker’s idea of ἀὐτόπιστος is influenced by the medieval idea of the principia per se nota. He quotes Aquinas more than the other medieval authors, but he uses him eclectically,
In his theological application of this philosophical term Whitaker seems to make a differentiation; he does not use the expression per se nota, but per se certae and this indicates that the Scriptures are not self-evident in the same way as the principles of science are. In the Duplicatio he says: “Scripture is αὐτόπιστος because it is to be believed by itself and for itself (per se & propter se credenda)”.

4.2.5 Internum and Externum as Private and Public

Stapleton stated in his Demonstratio that the Calvinists completely discredited the testimony of the Church regarding Scripture by their insistence on the hidden (arcanum) testimonium of the Spirit. “The testimony of the Spirit must be public and not only private; manifest and certain, not hidden.” Whitaker in turn denied that this was the most important point. He did not reject the testimony of the church but was willing to embrace it. Whitaker emphasized in his Disputatio that the status controversiae was whether the Scriptures are to be believed only on account of the testimony of the church or rather on account of the persuasion of the Spirit. Without using the term αὐτόπιστος Whitaker explains the relation between αὐτόπιστος and the testimonium in his formulation of the status controversiae.

The status therefore of the controversy is whether we are to believe that these Scriptures which we have, are sacred and canonical only on account of the testimony of the church, or rather on account of the internal persuasion of the Holy Spirit that causes Scripture – just as it is canonical and authentic in itself – also to appear as such to us and without which the testimony of the church is mute and powerless.

Whitaker says that Scripture is not only authentic in itself, but also with respect to us. There was no discussion with Rome about the authority of Scripture in se. In the discussion with the Counter-Reformation the self-convincing character of Scripture was not separated from the internal witness of the Spirit; the witness of the Spirit makes Scripture αὐτόπιστος quaod nos. The testimonium of the Spirit is contrasted with the testimonium of the church. The internal witness of the Spirit does not stand in opposition to the “external Word,” but it stands in opposition to the institutional witness of the church. The contrast internum versus externum is not subjective versus objective reading him and the other medieval theologians from Calvin’s perspective. Cf. Broeyer ‘Traces of the Rise of Reformed Scholasticism.’ 165, 178-179.

---

97 “Scriptura αὐτόπιστος est, quia per se & propter se credenda est.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 2, 109a.

98 “Punctum ergo Controversiae inter nos & adversarios hac in re est, quod illi quidem Ecclesiae testimonium vel nullius prorsus authoritatis esse sentiunt, ut Calvinus & eius sequaces.” Stapleton, Opera Omnia 1, 312.

99 “debere hoc testimonium Spiritus publicum esse, non privatum tantum: & manifestum ac certum, non arcanum.” Stapleton, Opera Omnia 1, 314.

102 Heim misinterpreted Whitaker when he said that he separated sacra Scriptura per se αὐτόπιστος and the testimonium Sp. S. quoad nos. Heim, Gewißheitsproblem, 295.
but personal versus ecclesiastical. Stapleton does not agree with Whitaker’s definition of the status controversiae. In his Defensio he replies: “The status controversiae that you now put forward as being between us and you, is nothing, it is your opinion, it is a monster, most stupidly invented by yourself.”¹⁰³ He objects to Whitaker’s antithesis of the testimony of the church and the testimony of the Spirit, for, according to him, the personal testimony of the Spirit depends on the public or institutional testimony of the church. Stapleton says that, according to the Calvinists, Scripture is to be believed only because of the private testimonium of the Spirit and Whitaker says that, according to the Catholics, Scripture is to be believed only because of the public testimonium of the church.

At the background of Stapleton’s convictions stands the Roman Catholic doctrine of faith; according to Stapleton, the actus of faith is impossible without the habitus of faith. He defined this habitus as the internal persuasion of the Holy Spirit (interna persuasio Spiritus Sancti), copying the Calvinistic terminology.¹⁰⁴ For Stapleton the church is a necessary means of grace, because the persuasio of the Spirit or the habitus of faith that is the basis for the actus of faith is the result of the infused grace (gratia infusa) that is given in the church through the sacraments. In the Duplicatio Whitaker rejects this distinction between actus and habitus fidei. For him the “infused disposition of faith” meant the act of faith itself, including the sure persuasion of the Spirit.¹⁰⁵

Whitaker reformulates his original status controversiae:

> We affirm, teach and defend that Scripture is άυτόπιστος, which means that it is for us canonical by itself and its divinity ought to be recognized and is recognized by us not because of the judgment of the Pope that is worthless, nor because of the testimony of the church and all the churches – for the whole church depends on Scripture and Scripture in no wise depends on the church – but because of the supremely divine character of the Scriptures.¹⁰⁶

According to Whitaker, Stapleton is wrong in his demand that the testimonium on which the authority of Scripture is based has to be externum and publicum.¹⁰⁷ Whitaker says that Scripture has no external power of compulsion, but only internally compels the ¹⁰³ “Status controversiae quem tu hic ponis, quasi inter nos & te, nullus est, commentum tuum est, chimaera est, a te stultissime inventa.” Stapleton, Opera Omnia 1, 864.

---

¹⁰⁵ “Nam habitus ille fidei infusus, quid aliud est, nisi ipsa fides, in qua certa est Spiritus Sancti persuasio.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 2, 23b. Cf. Schützechiel, Kirchlichen Lehrautorität nach Thomas Stapleton, 46-47. In this rejection he followed the Reformers. “The habitus gratiae implies an intrinsic righteousness in the believer, whereas the Reformers’ concept of imputed righteousness is extrinsic.” Muller, Dictionary, 134. The term habitus was not rejected completely in Reformed orthodoxy, probably because of the concept of the faculties of the soul. Cf. Muller, PRRD 1, 355-359.

¹⁰⁶ “Nos contra afferimus, docemus, defendimus scripturam esse άυτόπιστος, id est sibi nobisque per se canoniam: divinamque a nobis agnoscentam esse & agnosci non propter aut Papae iudicium, quod nucem vitiosam non valet, aut Ecclesiae Ecclesiaremque omnium testimonium, eum Ecclesia tota ex Scripturis pendeat, Scripturae nullo modo pendeat ex Ecclesia, sed propter ipsum Scripturaram divinissimum charactere.” Whitaker, Opera 2, 24b-25a.

¹⁰⁷ “Tu tale spiritus testimonium in Ecclesia constituis, quod neque scripturaram sit, neque internum, cuiusmodi nullum ne cogitari potest.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 2, 449b.
mind to assent. The problem with the authority of the church or the pope is that it is external and therefore unable to persuade us inwardly. “Unless that inward persuasion of the Holy Spirit comes into force, our heart can never securely and resolutely find rest (acquiescere) in any interpretation.” For Whitaker the church is a helpful aid in the acceptance of Scripture, but it is not essential. For Whitaker the testimonium internum of the Spirit in most cases is not paired with the testimonium externum of the Word, but with the testimonium externum or the institutional witness of the church. The distinction externum and internum refers to the authority of the church and the authority of the Spirit witnessing though the Word in the hearts of believers.

To illustrate this we can compare Whitaker’s statements with what Rollock says in his Treatise of Effectual Calling. The Holy Spirit effects the work of illumination by certain means and instruments. Rollock distinguishes two kinds of means, the first internal and the second external.

The inward mean is in the very Scripture itself; the outward is without the Scripture. The internal mean is the principal organ or instrument of God’s Spirit in this work and it is that very light which shineth in the Scripture. The Holy Ghost, then, doth first of all open the eyes of our understanding, by the light of the Scripture, to discern that light of the Scripture, so bright in itself, and so unknown unto us.

Under the external means or testimonies, Rollock primarily discusses the witness of the church regarding Scripture. The Spirit does not work faith in our hearts by this second kind of external means, but only prepares our hearts to receive faith or confirms that faith afterwards. Sometimes this second kind of means is sent before Scripture; Rollock refers to Augustine, who says that he would not have believed the gospel without the authority of the Catholic Church moving him. According to Rollock, Augustine means that he was prepared by the authority and testimony of the church to believe the gospel, but afterwards the Spirit that had thus prepared him worked faith in his heart through Scripture.

4.2.6 The Effect of the Word
Whitaker gives nineteen arguments to prove “that the authority of the Scriptures for us (quoad nos) does not depend on the judgment and authority of the church.” His fourth argument is a syllogism and runs as follows:

---

108 Whitaker, Opera Theologica 1, 356b. Cf. Whitaker, Disputation, 446.
110 Whitaker is accused by Stapleton of deviating from Calvin at this point. Whitaker, Opera Theologica 2, 3b.
111 Nevertheless, there are a few cases in which externum and internum refer to Word and Spirit. Whitaker says that “the internum testimonium of the Spirit always and necessarily is joined with the externum testimonium of the Scriptures.” Whitaker, Opera 2, 414a. Cf. Broeyer, William Whitaker, 142. Cf. Whitaker, Opera Theologica 1, 349a. Cf. Whitaker, Disputation, 415.
112 Rollock, Select Works 1, 70.
113 Rollock, Select Works 1, 71-72. Rollock follows Calvin’s exegesis of Augustine at this point.
114 The title of Quaestio 3.9, is: “Argumenta nostra, quibus probamus, Scripturarum authoritatem, quoad nos, non pendere ex Ecclesiae iudicio ac testimonio.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 1, 327b. Cf. Whitaker, Disputation, 332.
If Scripture has such great force and virtue in itself, as to draw up our souls to itself, to infuse into us an intimate persuasion of the truth, and of itself to commend itself to our belief; then it is certain that it is to us of itself αὐτόπιστος, canonical and authentic. Now the first is true, therefore also the second. There is no controversy about the major. The minor may be confirmed by testimonies of Scripture.

This third occurrence of αὐτόπιστος in the Disputatio shows that the term stands for the independent authority of Scripture. The conclusion that Scripture quoad nos is of itself αὐτόπιστος, canonical, and authentic, confirms Whitaker’s general thesis that the authority of Scripture quoad nos does not depend upon the judgment of the church. Here the effect of Scripture on the believer is an argument for its autopistia. The vis and virtus of Scripture to persuade us of its truth imply that Scripture is αὐτόπιστος. Whitaker refers to the parable of the seed (Luke 8,11). The Word of God is like seed that springs up of itself, breaks forth, and manifests its energy.

There is a certain divine force, virtue and efficacy in Scripture, which reaches not only the ears, but also the soul itself and penetrates to the inmost recesses of the heart and proves the most certain divinity of Scripture. Scripture therefore, which has such a force in itself and which so openly shows, proves, establishes itself and persuades us of its own truth, is by all means of itself canonical and authentic.

In his Defensio Stapleton answers that the seed mentioned by Jesus in the parable is not Scripture or the written Word of God, but the proclaimed Word of God. In his Duplicatio Whitaker denies the antithesis between the written Word and preached Word. “If the verbum praedicatum is αὐτόπιστος then the verbum scriptum must also be αὐτόπιστος, because the preaching of the Word originates from Scripture.”

Both opponents pass as ships in the night, because Whitaker goes back from the efficiency of preaching to the efficiency and autopistia of Scripture while Stapleton distinguishes between the original preaching of Christ and the later scriptural registration of that preaching. For Stapleton the verbum predicatum is primary and for Whitaker it is secondary to the verbum scriptum. For Stapleton the preaching of Christ was broader than its scriptural report in the gospels, while Whitaker would not accept any extrascriptural verbum predicatum of Christ.

115 “Si scriptura tantam in se vim ac virtutem, ut mentes nostras ad se rapiat, ut nobis penitus persuadeat, ut fidem nobis per se faciat, tum eam certum est per se αὐτόπιστον, Canoniciam, & authenticam nobis esse. At primum verum: ergo & secundum. De maioria nulla controversia. Minor vero scripturae testimoniis confirmari potest.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 1, 328b. Cf. Whitaker, Disputation, 335.

116 “Ex his omnibus locis intelligimus, divinam quandam vim, virtutem, & efficacitatem scripturis inesse, quae non ad aures modo perveniet, sed ad ipsum usque animum, & ad intimos cordis recessus penetret, & scriptuarum certissimam divinitatem comprobet. Scriptura ergo, quae talem in se vim habet, quaeque tam palam se prodit, arguit, confirmat, nobis de sua veritate persuadet, omnino Canonica per se & authentica est.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 1, 328b. Cf. Whitaker, Disputation, 336. He also refers to 1 Peter 1,13 and to Paul who says that his preaching was in demonstration of the Spirit and of power (1 Cor. 2,4).

117 “Semen enim de quo Christus loquitur Luc. 8. non est scriptura aut verbum Dei scriptum, sed verbum predicatum, quod auditu accipitur.” Stapleton, Opera Omnia 1, 1037. Cf. Whitaker, Opera Theologica 2, 386a

118 “Fixum igitur manet non aliu esse verbum praedicatum quam scriptum: quare si praedicatum verbum αὐτόπιστων sit, & scriptum erit, cum praedicatio ex scripturis pro ficiscatur.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 2, 387a-387b.
For Whitaker the autopistia of Scripture is the basis for its canonicity and authenticity. The term is used to counter one of the strongest arguments for the authority of the church: the determination of the canon. Whitaker develops the idea of the autopistia of Scripture exactly to answer this argument. The determination of the canon does not rest on the decision of the church, but flows from the autopistia of Scripture. On this issue Stapleton in the Defensio asks Whitaker how he will be able to establish the canonicity of the Scriptures without the authority of the church. In his Duplicatio Whitaker answers that the books of the canon ought to be indubitable in the church; it follows that these books cannot be accepted in the canon because of the authority of the church, but because of their own authority and divinity. The church did not make the books authentic or canonical, but only recognized them as such.

The term αὐτόπιστος indicates that the authority of Scripture in se and quoad nos is independent of and precedes the authority of the church; autopistia has become a technical term in the discussion between Reformation and Rome. This is illustrated by the fact that in the Duplicatio Whitaker underlines his point of the independent authority of Scripture by saying that there are many things that demonstrate the αὐτόπιστία of the Scriptures. This, however, is a contradiction in the terms, for demonstranda and αὐτόπιστία exclude each other. Autopistia has become an attribute of Scripture and a synonym for its independent authority and the original philosophical meaning of the term and its application in the theology of Calvin is lost out of sight.

4.2.7 Summarizing Remarks

Whitaker deals with the authority of Scripture in the context of anti-Catholic polemics. In this context the term αὐτόπιστος is useful to explain the Protestant position, although there is a tension between the polemical method and the original meaning of the term αὐτόπιστος, for if Scripture is self-convincing it does not need a polemical defense. We have seen that in the polemical context the meaning and the use of αὐτόπιστος has changed in several ways.

1. The term is not only used as an adjective, but also as a substantive. The autopistia of Scripture has become one of the attributes or properties of Scripture, along with the perspicuitas and sufficiens. In Whitaker’s theology the autopistia is the most central attribute of Scripture because it expresses its authority, as the title of his Duplicatio shows. This formalization of the autopistia of Scripture as a synonym for its authority carries the term away from its original meaning. Whitaker says that it is possible to demonstrate the autopistia of Scripture.

2. We have seen an emphasis on the authority of Scripture quoad nos. The term αὐτόπιστος is not used to express what Scripture is in itself, but why it has authority for us. Stapleton and the other Roman Catholic opponents admitted that Scripture has authority in and of itself, but they denied that it could have authority for us without the authority of the church. According to Whitaker, the testimony of the church is useful to 119 “Nam de quo nemo dubitet, id αὐτόπιστον esse necesse est: de scripturis autem quibusdam, iis nempe quae vero Canonicae vocantur, nunquam dubitatum fuit: sunt illae igitur scripturae αὐτόπιστοι.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 2, 241b.

---

120 “Hoc quidem a te verissime responsum est, atque ad Scripturarum demonstranda αὐτόπιστίαν plurimum facit.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 2, 366b.

148
move us to accept Scripture and to confirm its authority, but only the testimony of the Spirit can persuade us that Scripture is autópistos; Whitaker prefers the term persuasio to denote true faith.

3. The controversy with Rome places the use of autópistos in the much wider range of the questions of the determination of the canon and the authentic version of Scripture. Thus autópistos becomes a synonym for authentic and is applied to the original Hebrew and Greek text of Scripture. The Roman Catholic appeal to the authority of the Septuagint and the Vulgate seems to lead to a rejection of the authority of these ancient versions in Reformed orthodoxy. The term autópistos is not primarily used for the faith of believers that acquiesce in Scripture but to safeguard the original and authentic text of Scripture.

4. Regarding the determination of the canon, Whitaker says that the ancient church has accepted Scripture as canonical because of its autopistia. The canonical books of Scripture are not made authoritative through the determination of the church. On the contrary, the church accepts them, because the Spirit has shown the church that they are self-convincing. The same Spirit now shows this to believers and consequently the authority of the church is only a secondary help to establish the canon.

5. Finally, we have found that the terms externum and internum are not primarily related to Word and Spirit, but to the institutional testimony of the church and the personal testimony of the Spirit. The testimonium is so strongly related to Scripture that it is called non externum because it is found in Scripture itself; the testimonium is received from the doctrina of Scripture. For Whitaker the testimonium is not only internum in the hearts of believers but also internum in the text of Scripture. In this way he keeps autopistia and testimonium very close together. The testimonium of the Spirit makes the autopistia of Scripture so clear to believers that they accept Scripture on its own account.

Whitaker chooses the three offices of Christ to classify his disquisitions, and places the authority of Scripture in the context the prophetic office of Christ. Calvin discussed the authority of Scripture in the first part of the Institutes in the context of the knowledge of God. He did not feel completely comfortable with this position because the authority of Scripture and the testimonium belong to soteriology. Whitaker dismisses Bellarmine for discussing the authority of Scripture in the prolegomena, but does not openly criticize Calvin for doing the same.

Whitaker also connects the evidences to the testimonium in a more detailed way than Calvin. In the Institutes Calvin mentions evidences for the authority of Scripture and says that he would be able to demonstrate the divine origin of Scripture. Nevertheless, the testimonium is necessary to accept this authority with the certainty that is essential to saving faith. Calvin does not connect the evidences to the testimonium, because he is speaking to two different fronts. Whitaker says that the testimonium gives power (vis) to the evidences; in the Duplicatio he even goes a step further and says that there are many things that demonstrate the autopistia of Scripture.

Finally, Whitaker does not completely reject the authority and the testimony of the church, but emphasizes the private testimonium of the Spirit so much, that he leaves the church as an arbitrary extra witness. He tends to diminish the authority of the church, while for Calvin the church remained an important external means (medium externum) for the acceptance of Scripture. Maybe Stapleton is right when he accuses Whitaker of deviating from Calvin at this point. Whitaker takes a more subjective position than Calvin. For Whitaker the church is helpful in this respect, but it is not really necessary. This shift in emphasis may be due to the fact that he is only facing one front, while Calvin is always kept in balance by his polemics against the spiritualists of the Radical Reformation and needs the testimony of the church to avoid their subjectivism.

4.3 Franciscus Junius (1545-1602)
We will now turn to the question of how the concept of the autopistia of Scripture was influenced by the institutionalization of theology in the academic setting of the Reformed universities, by analyzing the work of Franciscus Junius, a Reformed professor at Heidelberg and Leiden, who was one of the most influential theologians of the early orthodox period. Of course Whitaker was also an academic theologian, but his work is characterized by his anti-Catholic polemics, while Junius’s discussion of the authority of Scripture stands in the context of a complete system of theology conveyed in the disputationes held under his responsibility. We will analyze these disquisitions to study the influence of the academic context on the Reformed concept of the autopistia of Scripture. A fifteen-year-old student in Lyon he was influenced by the reading of one of Cicero’s works and seduced to what he called “atheism.” Back home he had severe spiritual struggles, took his father’s New Testament, opened it at random, and read John 1.

I read part of the chapter and while I was reading I was so moved, that suddenly I sensed the divinity (divinitas) of the argument and the majesty (maiestas) and authority (auctoritas) of the written Word, that largely surpassed all the torrents of human eloquence. My body shivered, my heart was perplexed, and I was so affected the whole day that it even seemed uncertain to me who I was.

The Latin terms in this conversion narrative return in Junius’s disquisitions on the authority of Scripture, thus reflecting the experience of the autopistia of Scripture in his own spiritual life. As an Old Testament scholar he wrote commentaries on several books of the Bible and translated and annotated the whole Old Testament in Latin together with Immanuel Tremellius (1510-1580). Junius made some critical remarks in his exegetical works; he had reservations about the authorship of Second Peter and the letters of John.

---

Junius is important for the autopistia of Scripture, because the prolegomena of his system were very influential. Junius introduced the distinction between theologia archetypa, the infinite knowledge God has of himself and the theologia ectypa, the finite knowledge of God in the mind of creatures, in Reformed theology.\(^{124}\) Junius’s distinctions influenced Lutheran orthodoxy via John Gerhard (1585-1637).\(^{125}\) Gerhard was the first theologian among Lutherans to discuss the prolegomena in detail, introducing the term principium cognoscendi for Scripture into Lutheran orthodoxy, and the first to use the term αὐτόπιστος to define the principium, possibly under Junius’s influence.\(^{126}\) Gerhard related the autopistia of Scripture to its inspiration.\(^{127}\)

The disputation was one of the forms of scholastic public education; the presiding magister stated a subject (quaestio) in the form of theses and one of the students, the appointed respondens, had to answer the objections that were brought forward against the theses. The minutes, providing a summary of the discussion and not a verbatim report, were often published together with the conclusion of the professor.\(^{128}\) The disputations of the presiding professor gave an official and academic statement of the Reformed faith and, consequently, have more weight than the opinion of an individual author. In many cases the disputations were included in the posthumous publication of the professor’s works. Junius’s Opera Theologica contain two series of disputations; one held in Heidelberg under the title Theses Theologicae Heydelbergensis and one from Leiden, the Theses Theologicae Leydenses. The first series opens with the following disputations: (1) On the Definition of Theology, (2) On the Definition and \(^{124}\) In his De theologia vera (1594) Junius first made this distinction, derived from the medieval prolegomena of Duns Scotus. He divided the theologia ectypa in theologia unionis (the knowledge that Christ has of God), theologia visionis (the knowledge that the angels and saints in heaven have of God) and theologia viatorum (the knowledge that Christians have of God during their pilgrimage). Althaus, Prinzipien, 230-231. Cf. Muller, PRRD 1, 221-222; Muller, Dictionary, 299-301. Cf. C. De Jonge, De irenische ecclesiologie van Franciscus Junius (1545-1602): onderzoek naar de plaats van het geschrift ‘Le Paisible Chrestien’ (1593) in zijn theologisch denken, [Leiden] [1980], 51-57.

---

Material of Scripture, (3) On the Form of Scripture, (4) On the Efficient Cause of Scripture, (5) On the Purpose of Scripture, (6) On the Authority of Scripture (7) On the Authority of Scripture that does not Depend on the Church (8) On the Canon (9) On the Interpretation of Scripture, and (10) On Traditions.

Junius structured the doctrine of Scripture in a scholastic form according to the four Aristotelian causes. Aristotle had distinguished four different causes: the efficient cause (causa efficiens), the material cause (causa materialis), the formal cause (causa formalis), and the final cause (causa finalis). This distinction is essential for understanding how scholasticism as a method provided a model for structuring theological discussions.129

The term αὐτόπιστος does not occur in the Heidelberg theses, although Junius deals with questions about the authority of Scripture and the church. He says that “the authority of the church is secondary; it does not establish the divine authority of Scripture – for only God does that – but it witnesses to it.”130

The disputations of the second series are much longer; the titles of the first five disputations are: (1) On True Theology, (2) On Holy Scripture, (3) Elenctic Theses on Holy Scripture, (4) On the Authority of Holy Scripture, and (5) On the Authority and the Perfection of the Word of God. The disputations are not published in the same sequence in which they have been held, and therefore they sometimes overlap each other. In both series the locus de Scriptura receives a place between the opening disputation on the nature of theology and the discussion of the essence and attributes of God. This arrangement might have been from Junius himself, but this is not certain because the Opera Theologica were published after his death.131

4.3.1 De Sacra Scriptura

The second disputation of the Theses Theologicae Leydenses is titled De Sacra Scriptura.132 Junius says that the consideration of Holy Scripture is of the greatest importance among the theological questions and that many controversies are implicated in it.133 One of these controversies regards the authoritas of Scripture. Junius follows the four Aristotelian causes and proves that the material, the formal, the efficient and the final causes of Scripture are all divine. The goal (finis) of Scripture is the glory of God and the benefit of the elect in the conformation with God that emerges from the 129 Muller, PRRD 1², 238. Just for example, when a child builds a tower of blocks, the child is the efficient cause, the blocks are the material cause, the idea of a tower in the mind of the child is the formal cause, and the tower is the final cause.

130 “Auctoritas Ecclesiae est secundaria, non ad statuendum (hoc enim Dei solius est) sed ad testificandum diuinam auctoritatem Scripturae.” Junius, Opera Theologica 1, 1765. Cf. Junius, Opuscula Theologica Selecta, 305.
131 Van Asselt seems to overlook the fact that the arrangement of the loci is probably not from Junius. Van Asselt and Rouwendal, Inleiding, 106. Cf. Muller, PRRD 2², 113-114.
132 It was not possible to trace the original copy of this disputation and therefore the date and the name of the responding student remain obscure. Cf. De Jonge, Irenische ecclesiologie, 219.
communication of his Word and the internal operation of the Spirit. This leads to the conclusion that “the authority of Scripture is above all exception and its perfection is incomparable.” The authority of Scripture is perfect in itself and irresistible. It is in no way necessary either that the authority of the church confirms the authority of Scripture for us or that the decrees of the councils establish it; the calling of both is much more to hand on and proclaim the authority with which God himself has clothed Scripture.

Scripture is the indubitable rule of everything concerning our faith and life. Because the canon is the rule of faith it must be certain; the deuterocanonical books do not meet this condition because they lack the divine materia and forma.

And such is the truly divine canon, that consists of those books that God has written through his servants who were enabled (ικανωθέντας) by himself; it has τὸ αὐτόπιστον as a property of the fourth mode (proprium quarto modo) and it binds the faith, not because it is defined by the church, but because it is given and sealed by God himself.

Junius does not say that Scripture is αὐτόπιστος, but that it has τὸ αὐτόπιστον; the adjective is changed into a substantive. Proprium quarto modo indicates the strictest meaning of the term proprium and implies that the property belongs always and exclusively to all the members of a certain class. That Scripture has τὸ αὐτόπιστον means that it always and only and in every respect is self-convincing or has the characteristic of self-convincingness.

In this disputatio the evidences for the authority of Scripture are only listed. The maiestas of Scripture shines forth from the arrangement of the events and the harmony of the several parts. The church testifies to it, accepting God as the author of Scripture.

---

138 “Atque hic Vere divinus est canon, es iis librīs solummodo constans, quos Deus per servos suos ab ipso ικανωθέντας scripsit: Hic habet τὸ αὐτόπιστον proprie quarto modo, & obstringit fidem, nec ab Ecclesia definitus, sed a Deo ipso traditus & obsignatus est.” Junius, Opera Theologica 1, 1595. Cf. Junius, Opuscula Theologica Selecta, 108. The Greek word ικανωθέντας comes from ἰκανώ, which means to enable or to give a mandate.

139 The expression proprium quarto modo stems from scholastic philosophy, where four senses or modes of the word proprium are distinguished. A proprium is either (1) a characteristic of a species which belongs to all members of the species but not only to them, or (2) a characteristic that belongs only to the members of a species but not to all of them, or (3) a characteristic that belongs to all the members of a species and only to them, but not always. The strictest sense (4) of the word refers to a characteristic which always and only belongs to all the members of a species. P. Eisenberg, ‘How to Understand “De Intellectus Emendatione”,’ Journal of the History of Philosophy 9 (1971), 171-192, 181, n. 17. The use of this expression was not accidental. In his series of Animadversiones against Bellermine’s De verbo scripto et non scripto, Junius writes: “Divinus ille canon habet τὸ αὐτόπιστον proprie quarto modo (ut ita loquamur) & obstringit fidem.” Junius, Opera Theologica 2, 417.
Believers all agree on it (consensus piorum), even though they differ in other things. “Beyond contradiction, however, is the testimonium of the Holy Spirit, who works faith in the hearts of believers, that Holy Scripture has flowed from God its author.” The other testimonies are clear, but they cannot move us unless God directs our hearts to apprehend and believe them. Scripture is as a spiritual sun and no sound person can deny that it is clear per se. “But its clarity is not discerned except by those of whom the eyes are illuminated by the internal light of the Holy Spirit.”

Junius was involved in the editing of the final edition of the Belgic Confession (Antwerp, 1566). Therefore this remark may shed some light on the interpretation of this confession. As we have seen in our first chapter its text was changed; the edition of Antwerp (1566) has: “And also that they are approved by themselves, for even the blind themselves are able to sense that the things predicted in them do happen.” There were several possible answers to the question who were meant by the blind. It could be unbelievers who have no excuse, it could be the Jews, and the expression could be a general metaphor. Junius’s remarks point in the direction that the Belgic Confession intends that blind unbelievers are left without excuse because everyone will acknowledge that the sun shines, although the blind do not see it.

4.3.2 De Authoritate Sacrae Scripturae

The fourth disputation deals with the authority of Scripture under the title De Authoritate Sacrae Scripturae. It opens with the comment that Scripture, which is the means by which God communicates with us, has to be beyond all doubt; the authority of Scripture is a logical necessity. “In order that its certainty (certitudo) and αὐτοπίστια be rightly secured to human souls, first of all it must be fixed that it is divine in itself (in se), next that it is really confirmed as divine in us (in nobis),” The thesis closes with the remark that “if the foundation of the church is the doctrine of the apostles and prophets, then its certainty (certitudo) and steadfastness must be established by itself and before the church that is built on it.” The certainty of faith is at stake from the beginning to the end.

---

140 “Omni vero exceptione maius est singulare testimonium Spiritus Sancti, qui in cordibus fidelium fidem facit Scripturam sacram a Deo authore emanasse.” Junius, Opera Theologica 1, 1595. Cf. Junius, Opuscula Theologica Selecta, 107. We skip the third disputation of the Theses Theologicae Leydenses because Junius does not use the term αὐτοπίστια in it and much of it corresponds with the other disputations.

142 Bakhuizen van den Brink, Belijdenisgeschriften, 17. Cf. Muller, PRRD 2, 154.

143 The original copy of the disputation shows that the disputation was held on February 11, 1598 and that Jacobus Montanus, a student from Antwerpen was the respondens. F. Junius and J. Montanus, Disputationum theologicarum repetitarum quarta, de authoritate Sacrae Scripturae, Leiden 1598.

145 “Si fundamentum ecclesiae est Prophetica & Apostolica doctrina, necesse est ut eius certitudo & firmitas per se ante constet, quam ecclesiae, quae illi superstructa est.” Junius and Montanus,
The relationship of the testimonium and the evidences is different than in the second thesis; apparently the students had some liberty in their approach. First it is demonstrated that the divinity of the materia, forma, causa efficiens, and finis of Scripture establish the certitudo of Scripture in seipsa. Then the thesis continues: “Now we have to see how that which is sure in itself, can be sure for us and how we are certainly persuaded that all [the Scriptures] come from God.”

The demonstration of the authority of Scripture for us is divided into two parts: (1) a Domino and (2) ab Ecclesia. The first is divided into (1.1) the work of the Spirit, who seals the certainty of Scripture in the hearts by his supernatural light and (1.2) “the second testimony, Scripture itself, that carries clear marks (notae) before itself and presenting them to those of whom the eyes of the mind are enlightened by its supernatural light.”

The testimonium of the Spirit and the testimonium of Scripture are kept very close together, for the light that Scripture carries with itself is seen through the illumination of the Spirit. These two testimonies are sufficient, but certain arguments (argumenta) can be added, by which the authority of Scripture is confirmed. The thesis divides them into (a) argumenta insita and (b) argumenta adsita. The inherent arguments are divided in (a.a) a material argument, the heavenly doctrine of Scripture, and (a.b) formal arguments. The arguments a forma again are divided in (a.b.a) a forma interna, which is the fulfillment of the prophecies, and (a.b.b) a forma externa, the style and structure of the words. Then the thesis mentions three argumenta adsita or testimonia adsita: (b.a) the antiquity of Scripture, (b.b) the invincible strength of its truth, and (b.c) the consensus piorum. After the argumenta the disputatio mentions a testimonium ministeriale of the church. This ministerial witness does not give Scripture authority but it only acknowledges and confirms its authority for us.

It was a common scholastic method to divide a subject into basic elements and show how they were interrelated. The fulfillment of the prophecies, for example, was a different kind of argument than the antiquity of Scripture. More important is the distinction between the testimonia and the argumenta. In the second disputatio it seemed as if the testimonium of the Spirit was the primus inter pares of the evidences. Here the testimonium of the Spirit is closely related to the testimonium of Scripture.

---

De authoritate Sacrae Scripturae, 23. For some reason this final paragraph is missing in Junius, Opuscula Theologica Selecta, 117.

147 “Alterum vero testimonium est Scriptura ipsa, quae luculentas notas praesae fert, & confert iis, quorum oculi mentis luce supernaturali sunt illustrati.” Junius, Opera Theologica 1, 1602. Cf. Junius, Opuscula Theologica Selecta, 116. Repeated subdivision of a subject into two parts to reduce it to its basic components (bifurcation) became a common method in scholasticism under influence of Ramus, but the use of this method does not automatically imply Ramist influence, because his opponents also used it. According to De Jonge, there are no traces of Ramist philosophy in Junius’s theology. De Jonge, Irenische ecclesiologie, 260, n. 23. In recent publications on Ramus and his influence it is emphasized that his philosophy cannot be clearly defined. The idea that Ramism was an anti-scholastic alternative to Aristotelianism is a simplification. C. Strohm, ‘Theologie und Zeitgeist: Beobachtungen zum Siegeszug der Methode des Petrus Ramus am Beginn der Moderne,’ Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 110 (1999), 352-371.
Both are kept separate from the intrinsic and extrinsic arguments for Scripture and from the ministerial testimonium of the church. It is remarkable that the word testimonium is used for the work of the Spirit, for Scripture itself, for the authority of the church, and for the evidences at the same time.

4.3.3 De Verbi Dei Auctoritate & Perfectione

The fifth disputation of the Theses Theologicae Leydenses deals with the authority and perfection of Scripture.¹⁴⁸ The term ἀντίπαστος is not used here, but the disputation deals with the relationship between the evidences and the testimonium and also distinguishes between a testimonium internum and a testimonium externum. The disputation opens with the remark that verbum Dei does not stand for Christ, the eternal Word of God, or the Logos, but for the external inspired Word.¹⁴⁹ After distinguishing the apocrypha from the canonical books, Junius says of the latter that their authoritas is beyond question, that they are infallible, and that their perfection is so sublime that they contain everything necessary for saving faith and a life to the honor of God. Then he proves the authority of Scripture by testimonies and arguments.

The testimonies are either internal or external. The internum testimonium that exceeds all other authority and without which all the other testimonies and arguments will be of no weight or importance for us (apud nos), is the Holy Spirit speaking to our hearts and testifying to our spirits that these books of Holy Scripture are ἡθοπνεῦστος, that is dictated by Him.¹⁵⁰

The externum testimonium is threefold: The first external testimony is Scripture itself or rather God who speaks to us in Scripture and asserts its divine authority.¹⁵¹ The second is that of the prophets and apostles who have handed over to the church what they received from the Lord. The third is the church that gives a constant and perpetual consent to Scripture. This third externum testimonium is restricted. Just as Scripture is canonical and authentic in itself (in se), it also appears to be so to us (nobis), and the testimonium of the church is mute and invalid without the testimony of the Spirit.¹⁵² The phraseology in the disputation is almost literally the same as Whitaker’s status

¹⁴⁸ The original disputation was held on April 5, 1601; an English student, Daniel Castellanus from Canterbury, was the respondens. Cf. F. Junius, L. Trelcatius, and F. Gomarus, Disputationes theologicae XXIV, Leiden 1601-1602, [2].

¹⁴⁹ “VERBUM Dei intelligimus non Verbum aeternum Filium aeterni Patris, nempe λόγον ἡφιστάμενον sed Verbum externum à Deo sanctis, & certis hominibus inspiratum.” Junius, Opera Theologica 1, 1603. Cf. Junius, Opuscula Theologica Selecta, 117.

¹⁵¹ “Externum Testimonium est, 1. Ipsius S. Scripturae, seu potius Dei nobis in S. Scriptura loquentis, & se eius authorem esse asserentis.” Junius, Opera Theologica 1, 1604. Cf. Junius, Opuscula Theologica Selecta, 118. The references to 2 Tim. 3,16; 2 Peter 1,21; Is. 58,14 and Ezech. 12,25,28 show that Junius means that Scripture claims to be the Word of God.

¹⁵² “ut quemadmodum S. Scriptura in se est canonica atque authentica, sic nobis quoque videatur; & sine quo Ecclesiae testimonium mutum prorsus atque inululidum esse censemus.” Junius, Opera Theologica 1, 1604., Cf. Junius, Opuscula Theologica Selecta, 118.
controversionis in his Disputatio; it is probably copied. Through the internal testimonium believers not only are persuaded that everything in the Scriptures is dictated by God, but they also are enabled to discern these books from the false and counterfeit books by a spiritual judgment; the testimonium of the Spirit enables the Christian to know which books are canonical.

After the testimonia the thesis mentions eleven arguments “from which the authority of these Scriptures also can be concluded.” Among these are some of Calvin’s arguments, such as the heavenliness of its doctrine, the unity of its parts, and its antiquity. But Junius also mentions the fact that the Scriptures alone exhibit liberation from sin and death. He even mentions the severe punishment of the enemies of Scripture such as Pharaoh and Ahab and the Roman emperors Nero and Domitian.

Although all these arguments bind and force our judgment and strongly prove that Scripture is truly divine, still they absolutely cannot persuade us firmly of this, unless the testimonium of the Holy Spirit comes with them. That alone gives these arguments power (vis) and not only forces and presses us, like them, but also awakens our whole mind to assent and fills our hearts with wonderful assurance (plhroforia) and causes us to embrace Holy Scripture as truly theotyceous.

What is said of the argumenta can be applied to the testimonia externa as well; only the Holy Spirit can give us the full assurance of the divine origin and authority of Scripture. Just like Whitaker, Junius connects the evidences with the testimonium, by saying that the testimonium gives power (vis) to the evidences. Junius divides the testimonium into the internal testimonium of the Spirit and the external testimonium of the text of Scripture, 153 “ut quemadmodum Scriptura est in se Canonica atque authentica, sic nobis quoque videatur, & sine qua testimonium Ecclesiae mutum atque invalidum est.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 1, 315a. Cf. Whitaker, Disputation, 280. It is also possible that both depend on a third source.

---

157 “Quae omnia argumenta, licet judicium nostrum constringat & cogant, & Scripturam hanc verè Diuinam esse validè euincant; tamen nuncquam firmiter id nobis persuadere possunt, nisi accedat Spiritus Sancti testimonium, qui solus illis argumentis vim addit; nec tantum cogit & premitt, vt illa, sed etiam totam mentem ad assentiendum excitat, & animos nostros mirificâ quàdam plhroforia comple, factique vt S. Scripturam, tanquam vere theotyceous amplectamur.” Junius, Opera Theologica 1, 1604-1605. Cf. Junius, Opuscula Theologica Selecta, 118.

158 Again there is a remarkable resemblance with Whitaker’s Disputatio. “Illud vero quando accedit, mirifica quadam plhrophoria animos nostros comple, confirmat, factique ut scripturam libentissime amplectamur, & superioribus illis argumentis vim addit.” Whitaker, Opera Theologica 1, 319a. Cf. Whitaker, Disputation, 295. Probably the English student Castellanus had read Whitaker as a preparation for his disputation.
the authors of Scripture, and the church; for Junius the Word is externum and the Spirit is internum.\(^{159}\)

4.3.4 De Verbo Dei Scripto

One other disputation held under Junius’s supervision deserves to be mentioned here, the Disputatio theologica de Verbo Dei Scripto, which was structured according to the Aristotelian method of the causes.\(^{160}\) In the causa efficiens a definition of inspiration is given. God has spoken through the prophets and “afterwards has written his Word, partly immediately by his own finger, partly mediate, dictating through his Spirit to Moses and the other prophets and holy men as instruments the texts he willed to be written down.”\(^{161}\) The second cause is a causa impulsiva, namely the benevolence of God; God has graciously revealed his Word to us for our wellbeing, because without Scripture the purity of the doctrine is in danger. The material cause of Scripture is the res divinae: God and everything ordained by him.

Then the disputation turns to the canon. “Next, the canon of Holy Scripture is the doctrina comprehended in both Testaments and now it is handed on to the church, to be the only certain and perfect rule of faith and our life.”\(^{162}\) Three criteria for the canonical books are mentioned: They must be written by the prophets or apostles, they must be written in Hebrew or Greek, and they must be approved by Christ or his apostles and also accepted and recognized by the Christian and Apostolic church. The apocryphal books do not meet these criteria and are not in complete agreement with the canon: “They are not αὐτόπιστοι and therefore they cannot be publicly propagated in the church to confirm and establish the dogmas of faith, although in the meanwhile they can be used privately for edification.”\(^{163}\) Then the thesis discusses the causa formalis and causa finalis of Scripture. Its form is twofold: internal and external.

The internal form is the divine, just, perfect, and holy truth that in this living Word can be communicated to human beings, and its report divinely impressed in the holy Scriptures. Therefore we should hold nothing to be truly and savingly divine that has not been confirmed by God in holy Scripture, which is therefore called αὐτόπιστοι.\(^{164}\)

---

\(^{160}\) For some reason it is not included in the collection of the Opera Theologica. We only have the original separate publication of the disputation. It was held on January 26, 1600; Symeon Guilielmius from Rotterdam was the respondens. F. Junius and S. Guilielmius, Disputatio theologica de Verbo Dei Scripto, Leiden 1600.

\(^{161}\) “postea Verbum suum, partim immediate digito suo conscripsit; partim mediate, eodem Spiritu dictante, primum a Mose, tum ab aliis Prophetis virisque sanctis, tanquam instruments, literis consignari voluit.” Junius, Guilielmius, De Verbo Dei scripto, [1].

\(^{162}\) “Ceterum Canon S. Scripturae est doctrina utriusque Testamenti libris compraehensa, ad hoc Ecclesiae tradita, ut sola certa, & perfecta sit regula fidei & vitae nostrae.” Junius, Guilielmius, De Verbo Dei scripto, [2].

\(^{163}\) “eoque non esse αὐτόπιστοι, ac propterea publice in Ecclesia ad fiei dogma constitueundum & stabiliendum non posse proferri, posse interea privatis ad aedificationem proponi.” Junius and Guilielmius, De Verbo Dei scripto, [2].

\(^{164}\) “Interna, est divina veritas, justa, perfecta, sancta, quae in hac vita sermone est communicabilis cum homine, & relatio eius divinitus impressa in Sacris, adeo ut nihil sit divine
The internal form is the self-convincing truth communicated in the living Word and impressed in the report of Scripture. The external form is the verbal expression (oratio) of this truth. The final cause of Scripture ultimately is God’s glory and, secondarily, the gathering of the church to eternal salvation.

The disputatio also discusses some of the properties of Scripture, such as its auctoritas, its perfectio, and its puritas. The authenticity of the Latin Vulgate as stated by the Council of Trent is rejected, because this translation does not have enough authority of itself.165 “Holy Scripture, however, written in Hebrew in the Old Testament and in Greek in the New is inspired, self-convincing, and therefore infallible (θεόπνευστος, αὐτόπιστος, εορτε ἀναμάρτητος) and in no wise corrupt.”166 The adjective αὐτόπιστος is used in the context of the canonicity of the Scriptures and the authenticity of the original languages. Only the Hebrew and Greek Bible have the ultimate authority.

4.3.5 Summarizing Remarks
A few remarks on Junius’s position may illustrate the influence of the academic setting on the concept of the autopistia of Scripture.
1. The locus de Scriptura is placed after the disputation on the nature of theology and before the disputations on God. Although it is not certain that this arrangement stems from Junius, he paid special attention to theology as a science in the prolegomena of his system and introduced the distinction between theologia archetypa and theologia ectypa in Protestant theology. One would expect that the term αὐτόπιστος would occur in the disputations on theology, but Junius uses it in several ways in his disputations on Scripture. We will have to look carefully at the further development of Reformed orthodoxy to see if this place in the system was maintained.
2. Junius not only uses the adjective αὐτόπιστος but also the substantive τὸ αὐτόπιστον; this reminds us of the use of ἀυτοπιστία by Whitaker. In scholastic terminology αὐτόπιστος is formalized into αὐτόπιστα and even called a proprium or essential attribute of Scripture. The shift to a substantive indicates that autopistia has become one of the attributes of Scripture. In the case of Junius the self-convincingness of Scripture is presupposed; because the canon as the rule of faith must be certain, the canonical books must necessarily be self-convincing. That Scripture has τὸ αὐτόπιστον means that it always and only and in every respect is self-convincing or has the proprium of self-convincingness.
3. Junius uses the term αὐτόπιστος to determine the canon, the apocryphal books are not αὐτόπιστος, and for the original Hebrew and Greek version of Scripture, the Vulgate is not αὐτόπιστος. This brings the meaning of the term αὐτόπιστος closer to authentic than to self-convincing. In other words the term does not refer to the acceptance of 165 veritatis atque salutaris tenendum a nobis, quod non habeatur in S. Scriptura a Deo consignatum; ideoque αὐτόπιστος vocatur.” Junius and Guilielmius, De Verbo Dei scripto, [3].

---

166 “Vulgatem vero Latinem, quam Patres Tridentini pro authentica jubent haberi, pro ea non agnoscimus, cum nec fideb aut authoritatem ex se habeat sibi sufficientem.” Junius and Guilielmius, De Verbo Dei scripto, [6].
Scripture by believers, but to the inspiration of Scripture and the original text in which it resulted.

4. The relationship between the evidences and the testimonium is explained in various ways. In the second disputation the evidences for the authority of Scripture are listed; the testimonium is greater than all the other testimonies, but still it is one of them. In the fourth disputation the testimonium of the Spirit is related closely to the maiestas or testimonium of Scripture; the light that Scripture carries with itself is seen through the illumination of the Spirit. These two testimonia are distinguished from the intrinsic and extrinsic arguments and from the ministerial testimonium of the church. The word testimonium is not used exclusively for the work of the Spirit. In the fifth thesis the testimonia are divided into internal and external and distinguished from the arguments. It is clear that the issue was not yet settled and that there were various ways of interpreting the relationship between the evidences for the authority of Scripture and the testimonium of the Spirit. The authority of the church is not denied, but is always subjected to the testimony of the Spirit, even in the determination of the canon.

5. We have found the distinction between a testimonium internum and three testimonia externa. The first is that of the Holy Spirit speaking to our hearts and the others are that of Holy Scripture itself, that of the Prophets and Apostles and that of the church. Junius seems to go a step further than Whitaker, for whom externum versus internum primarily referred to the contrast between the church and the believer. Junius also uses the word-pair for the relationship between Word and Spirit. The use of the terms, however, is too complicated to be explained as objective versus subjective. In the disputation De Verbo Dei scripto he distinguishes between an internal and external form of the Word. The forma interna is the self-convincing truth, whereas the forma externa is the verbal expression of the truth; internus sometimes refers to the revealed truth and not to the believer.

4.4 Internum and Externum
The word-pair externum and internum is becoming increasingly important in this study. In Whitaker’s discussion with the Counter-Reformation the testimonium internum of the Spirit is mentioned next to the external testimonies (externa testimonia). The testimonium internum is closely related to Scripture, because it is received through the doctrina of Scripture. For Whitaker testimonium internum and testimonium externum mostly do not stand for the Spirit and the Word, but for the Spirit and the church. Junius distinguishes between a testimonium internum and testimonia externa; the first is that of the Holy Spirit speaking to our hearts and the others are that of Holy Scripture itself, that of the prophets and apostles, and that of the church. It would be very interesting to study the development of the combination externum and internum, but a detailed examination is not possible in the context of this study.

Sometimes other words are used to express the relationship between Word and Spirit. In his Compendium Theologiae Christianae Johannes Wollebius (1586-1629) distinguishes between the principal testimonium of the Spirit and the ministerial testimonium of the church and then makes a distinction between two sides of the testimonium of the Spirit: an outward (foris) side in Scripture itself and an inward (intus) side in the hearts of believers.\textsuperscript{167}

4.4.1 Heppe and Muller

Heppe states that the Reformed orthodox opinion that the canonical Scriptures not only contain, but are God’s written Word, is a deviation of the Reformation. He adds that verbum internum and verbum externum took the place of the former distinction between verbum ἐγγραφον, the Word of God in its original revelation, and verbum ἔγγραφον, the recording of that Word in Scripture.\textsuperscript{168} Heppe suggests that there is a relationship, but does not go into detail; he only expresses his regret that Scripture in its written form was identified with the Word of God.

In his volume on \textit{Holy Scripture} Muller criticizes Heppe at this point. He denies that Christ as the living Word is emphasized at the cost of Scripture in the Reformation and that Scripture is emphasized at the cost of the living Word in Reformed orthodoxy.\textsuperscript{169} The changes in the use of the terms can better be understood in terms of the separation of the various theological topics within the doctrine of Scripture. Muller discusses various distinctions extensively. The most basic one is that between Christ as the essential and eternal Word (Logos) of God and the various forms of revelation. Verbum ἐγγραφον and verbum ἔγγραφον refer to the historical path of revelation; the Word that is now written in Scripture first had an unwritten or “enunciative” form.\textsuperscript{170} This replaced the Catholic concept of tradition as the authoritative verbum ἐγγραφον next to Scripture. The distinction between unwritten and written Word refers to a historical dimension, while that between the verbum internum and externum “binds Word and Spirit together by distinguishing between the historical external prophetic office of Christ as Word and the ongoing internal teaching office of Christ by means of his Spirit.”\textsuperscript{171} Muller correctly states that both word-pairs refer to different spheres, but he does not explain where the combination externum and internum comes from.

In his volume on the \textit{Prolegomena to Theology} Muller mentions the distinction between the immanent Word (λόγος ἐνδιάθετος) and the enunciative Word (λόγος προφορικός). This also might have influenced the use of internum and externum.

‘The word of man,’ argues Junius, ‘is multiplex’: there is the innate or indwelling word, called logos emphytos by the fathers, which is the intellect itself; then there is the implanted or ratiocinated word, the sermo inditus or logos endiathetos, which resides in the mind of creatures in accordance with their rational capacity; and, third, there is the sermo enunciativus \textsuperscript{167} “IX. Testimonium autem doc duplex, principale & ministeriale. Principale est testimonium Spiritus sancti, foris, in seipso Scriptura, intus vero in corde ac mente hominis fidelis ab ipso illuminati, loquentis, eique Scripturae divinitatem persuadentis. Ministeriale vero testimonium est testimonium Ecclesiae.” J. Wollebius, \textit{Compendium theologiae Christianae}, Amsterdam 1655, 3-4. Wollebius does not use the term αὐτόποισας but he says: “Just like people in the schools do not dispute against those who deny the principia of everything, so those who deny the principia of the Christian religion must also not be counted worthy of hearing.” Wollebius, \textit{Compendium}, 3.

\textsuperscript{169} Muller, \textit{PRRD} 2\textsuperscript{2}, 185-186.

\textsuperscript{170} Muller, \textit{PRRD} 2\textsuperscript{2}, 197.

\textsuperscript{171} Muller, \textit{PRRD} 2\textsuperscript{2}, 201.
or logos prophorikos, the word sent forth or enunciated, which is the outward communication of a word known inwardly to the intellect.172

Applied analogically to the Word of God the logos emphytos corresponds with Christ as the essential Word, the logos endiathetos corresponds with the Word effectuated or brought into existence by the Spirit in the human subject, while the logos prophorikos corresponds with the Word that flows from God in an external existence. Junius does not use the terms internum and externum in this respect.

4.4.2 Three Parallel Distinctions

The theology of Johann Heinrich Alsted (1588-1638), a pupil of Amandus Polanus von Polansdorf (1561-1610), serves to illustrate the different combinations of words that may have influenced each other. First of all, the Logos inherent in God (λόγος ἐνδιαθέτως) and the Logos emanating from God (λόγος προφορικός) are applied to revelation: the Word of God sent forth to the minds of the authors of Scripture (verbum prophorikum) and the Word of God implanted in their minds (verbum endiathetum).173 Alsted, who was influenced by Petrus Ramus (1515-1572), distinguishes between the enunciated Word (verbum enuntium or προφορικός) and the inspired Word (verbum inspiratum or ἐνδιαθέτως).174 As examples of the verbum inspiratum he mentions dreams and visions; the verbum enuntium is the voice of God that was audible for the prophets and apostles. According to Alsted, the verbum inspiratum or ἐνδιαθέτως is received intrinsically and the verbum enuntium or προφορικός extrinsically.175

The second distinction, originally stemming from Roman Catholic theology, between the written (ἐγγραφον) and unwritten (ἄγγραφον) Word, stands for Scripture and tradition. This distinction is copied by Protestant theologians, but the meaning shifts, because the authority of tradition as a source next to Scripture is rejected. Instead of the distinction of Scripture and tradition, comes a chronological or historical distinction between the Word of God as it has been revealed to the authors before writing it down (verbum ἐγγραφον) and the written Word of God in Scripture (verbum ἐγγραφον).176

---

175 “Et hoc sensu quidem illum vocant ἐν διάθετως, quia reipitur intrinsecus, hunc προφορικόν, quia recipitur extrinsecus.” Alsted, Praecognitorum Theologicorum 1, 119.

176 Thus Francis Turretin and Leonardus Rijssen (1636-1695) write that the distinction of a verbum ἐγγраφον and verbum ἐγγραφον is not a division of a genus into species, as the Papists would have it, but of the subject into its accidents; the same Word that once was non scriptum now is Alsted says: “verbūm Dei externum is ἐγγραφὸν or ἔγγραφον, that is written or non-written.” This illustrates that Heppe is wrong in stating that the distinction of the verbūm internum and externum replaces the older distinction ἔγγραφον and ἐγγραφόν; both stand on a different level. The enunciative Word (λόγος προφητικός) was divided into the verbūm ἔγγραφον and the verbūm ἔγγραφον. John Owen (1616-1683) writes: “Just as the Word of God is ἐνδιάθεσιν or προφητικῶν, so that in turn is ἔγγραφον or ἔγγραφον.”

The third distinction refers to the species of the Word of God: verbūm internum and verbūm externum. Alsted says: “The Word of God in species is internal or external.” The Word of God as it is inspired to the writer is the verbūm internum while the Word of God as it is expressed by the writer is the verbūm externum; therefore the verbūm internum is principal and the verbūm externum is instrumental. For Alsted the distinction internum and externum runs parallel to ἐνδιάθεσιν and προφητικῶν. The verbūm internum is the internal communication of theology to the heart; the eye of the mind is illuminated and given spiritual light. Alsted does not want to press the distinction too far. The external and internal Word should not be separated.

Finally these distinctions are applied from the realm of revelation to the realm of faith. The verbūm internum that once was inspired in the hearts and minds of the authors of Scripture must also enter into the minds and hearts of the readers of Scripture. The verbūm internum “is the internal light by which the eye of our mind is enlightened, scriptum. Cf. Heppe, Dogmatik, 16. Cf. Heppe, Reformed Dogmatics, 14-15. Cf. Muller, PRRD 2, 197.

Verbum Dei externum est ἔγγραφον vel ἔγγραφον, id est scriptum vel non-scriptum.” J.H. Alsted, Encyclopaedia, Herborn 1630, 2, 1575.

Muller, PRRD 1, 266.

“Verbum Dei internum est principale, externum instrumentale. Alsted, Theologica didactica, 9. Cf. Solent quidam verbūm Dei internum vocare principale, & verbūm externum instrumentale […] sic ut Deus & per verbūm internum nos doceat principaliter, & per verbūm externum instrumentaliter.” Alsted, Praecognitorum Theologicorum 1, 118.

“Verbum Dei internum est, quo Deus hominibus intus Theologiam communicat, oculos mentis illorum illustratis, & luce spirituali cognitionis salvifice accensa.” Alsted, Praecognitorum Theologicorum 1, 119.

“Externum verbūm ab interno non est separandum, sed coniunctum cum eo esse necessum est, ut efficax & salutare sit.” Alsted, Praecognitorum Theologicorum 1, 122.
while the verbum externum is the outward lamp that is lighted.\(^{184}\) The distinction is even applied to Scripture itself. The Scriptura interna is the immediate writing of the Spirit in the hearts of the children of God predestinated to eternal life. The Scriptura externa is written by prophets and apostles to transmit the doctrine of heavenly wisdom to posterity. This Scriptura externa we generally call sacra Scriptura.\(^{185}\) “Scriptura externa without interna is not profitable to salvation, for if Scriptura externa is separated from interna as the superior light, there can be no saving faith in us, because the Holy Spirit kindles saving faith through the Word as through an instrument.”\(^{186}\) The original verbum internum in the heart and mind of the writer has become a verbum externum in Scripture and this verbum externum again must become a verbum internum in the heart of a believer through the work of the Spirit.

4.4.3 A Principium Internum?

Muller goes one step further and says that Alsted and Johannes Maccovius (1578-1644) call the inwardly known Word of God the principium internum of theology.\(^{187}\) Alsted, however, does not use the term principium internum, but verbum internum and he does not draw the conclusion that this internal verbum or Scriptura or testimonium is a principium internum of theology that corresponds with Scripture as the principium externum. Contrariwise, he expressly says that the verbum externum (Dominus dixit or Deus dixit) is the principium unicum of our theology, the principle that resolves all dogmatic statements.\(^{188}\) Maccovius identifies the principium internum of theology as the verbum Dei, but not as the inwardly known Word of God as Muller concludes. For Maccovius the term internum refers to the fourfold causality. The use of the word-pair in scholasticism is complicated and cannot be interpreted simplistically in a subject-object scheme. The material cause and the formal cause are classified as the causae internae, while the efficient cause and the final cause are the causae externae. This subdivision of the four causes goes back to Duns Scotus.\(^{189}\) Maccovius calls God the principium externum of theology, because he is the causa efficiens and the causa finalis of theology: he calls the Word of God the principium internum of theology, because it is the causa formalis and the causa materialis of theology. Theology has God as its source and end, Scripture as \(^{185}\) Alsted, Praecognitorum Theologieorum 1, 124. The texts from Scripture that he refers to, speak of the work of the Spirit in the hearts of believers.

---

\(^{187}\) Muller, PRRD 1\(^{\text{st}}\), 442, n. 147.

\(^{189}\) Wieland, ‘Prinzip II Mittelalter,’ 1352.
its rule and content. This is something different than the internal Word of God as a subjective principle of theology.

The combination is also used by Junius in such a sense that it can hardly be identified with objective and subjective. “Theology is communicated to us through in two modes, by nature and grace. The former as internal principle of communication; the latter as external principle. For this reason the first is called natural theology, the second supernatural.” Here nature is the principium internum and grace is the principium externum and not vice versa. The principium internum is inherent in nature itself, while the principium externum comes from outside of nature. Internum and externum mean intrinsic and extrinsic. These examples show how complicated the use of the word-pair is and how a simplistic interpretation from a modern perspective in terms of object and subject can easily lead to misunderstanding.

Although Alsted does not use the term principium internum he does emphasize the necessity of the verbum internum and the Scriptura internum. In his discussion of the verbum externum, Alsted states that the canonical books are the first and ultimate principium cognoscenti in theology. Muller’s conclusion that Alsted and Maccovius spoke of the internal Word (verbum internum) or the testimonium of the Spirit as a subjective principle (principium internum) of theology is disputable. In his volume on Scripture, Muller asserts that faith is a principium internum of theology in Reformed orthodoxy. This conclusion is based on Petrus van Mastricht (1630-1706), but Muller seems to overlook the fact that Mastricht discusses faith as the first locus of his theological system and not as a part of the prolegomena. Mastricht does not use principium internum for faith; Scripture is the only principium of theology. In the further analysis of the autopistia of Scripture we will take notice of the terms internum and externum.

190 J. Maccovius, Loci communes theologici, Franeker 1650, 3-5, 10.
193 “Libri Canonici sunt principium cognoscenti primum & ultimum in sacra Theologia.” Alsted, Theologica didactica, 12.
4.5 The Arminian Controversy
The third aspect of Reformed orthodoxy that may have influenced the concept of autopistia regards internal conflicts. The first of the two cases that we will discuss is the conflict with the Arminians who have been accused by the Reformed of a looser view of Scripture because of denying that its infallibility extends to all parts of Scripture.

Jacobus Arminius (1560-1609) uses the term αυτόπιστος to reject the binding authority of the Reformed confessions like the Belgic Confession and the Heidelberg Catechism and advocates the liberty to examine the confessions by the Scriptures. In a certain sense the Belgic Confession gives the room to do so; for it says that we must not consider human writings – no matter how holy their authors may have been – equal to the divine writings.195 According to the Contra-Remonstrants, the rejection of the binding authority of the confessions indicates the rejection of essential Reformed doctrines. Arminius, on the other hand, says that it is tyrannical to bind the conscience to human writings like the Reformed confessions. It is remarkable that both parties use the term αυτόπιστος to express their feeling. Arminius says: “No writing composed by men – by one man, by a few men, or by many – with the exception of Scripture – is either αυτόπιστος or αξιόπιστος and therefore is not exempted from an examination by means of the Scriptures.”196 Scripture is the only norma of the truth “from itself, in itself and through itself” and it is erroneous to say “that they are indeed the rule, but only when understood according to the Belgic Confession or explained by the Heidelberg Catechism.”197

4.5.1 Reactions from Franciscus Gomarus and Festus Hommius
Arminius’s opponent Franciscus Gomarus (1563-1641) also uses the term αυτόπιστος. According to Gomarus, the theology of the pilgrims (theologia viatorum) is imperfect in relation to the heavenly knowledge of God, but perfect in relation to its goal. This knowledge comes from God and is αυτόπιστος and ανθρώπινος.198 In the disputation on Scripture (De scriptura sacra) Gomarus says that only the original Greek and Hebrew writings are authentic and αυτόπιστος and that all versions ought to be corrected according to the divine language.199 After the time of the apostles the immediate revelation of the doctrine of salvation has come to an end and the canon has become the only principium αυτόπιστος of Christian theology.200

195 Confessio Belgica, art. 7.
200 “Totus Canon [...] & post Apostolos, deficiencte doctrinae salutaris revelatione immediate, cognitionis theologiae Christianae principium organicum αυτόπιστον est, atque unicum: ex
The term αὐτόπιστος gains a different meaning in a different context. For Arminius the autopistia of Scripture safeguards the liberty of the biblical exegete and theologian over against the authority of the human confessions. For Gomarus the autopistia of Scripture safeguards the purity of the original text over against human corruption. Arminius seems to come close to Calvin’s intention to liberate Scripture from the human authority of the magisterium of the church, but his appeal to the autopistia of Scripture in fact serves the purpose of personal liberty from the church and its confessions. For Gomarus the autopistia of Scripture corrects this liberty.

The autopistia of Scripture remained an issue in the controversy after the death of Arminius. Festus Hommius (1576–1642), the secretary of the synod, published a version of the Belgic Confession, demonstrating article by article at which points the Remonstrants disagreed. After the third article, on the written Word of God, Hommius states: “They seem to teach against this article that the prophets and apostles who wrote Holy Scripture not always and everywhere acted by the Holy Spirit but in some things could err.” Hommius explicitly says that some of Remonstrants doubted the autopesia of Scripture. In his Disputationes theologicae Hommius writes that the Word of God is the true principium of religion, αὐτόπιστος and ἀνεξέταστος (without investigation). Hommius also distinguishes the autopistia from the axiopistia of Scripture. Scripture is not only ἀξιόπιστος, but also αὐτόπιστος. It is not clear if this is intended as a correction of Arminius who placed both terms next to each other, for as we have seen this was also the case in some orthodox Reformed works. The emphasis on the distinction between both terms can be the result of the desire to stress that Scripture is meant to counterbalance our human liberty. Scripture is worthy of our trust, but also convinces us of its trustworthiness of itself.

quod, oritur primo, & in quod, ultimo resolvitur. Cujus auctori DÆO, sit GLORIA.” Gomarus, Opera 2. 5. Gomarus does not use the term αὐτόπιστος in his extensive work De sacra scriptura. Gomarus, Opera 2, 174-201.

202 F. Hommius, Specimen controversiarvm Belgicarvm, seu Confessio ecclesiævrm reformatarv in Belgio, Leiden 1618. This work was designed for the foreign delegates of the Synod of Dort. Platt, Reformed Thought and Scholasticism, 111.

203 “Contra hunc Articulum doceri videtur. 1. Prophetas & Apostolos S. Scripturae Scriptores in scribendo non semper, vel ubique, actos a Spiritu S. sed in nonnullis potuisse errare.” F. Hommius, Specimen controversiarvm Belgicarvm, seu Confessio ecclesiævrm reformatarv in Belgio, Leiden 1618, 11. Hommius refers to the work of Faustus Socinus that was published and edited by Conrad Vorstius. Cf. F. Socinus, De auctoritate S. Scripturae; opusculum his temporibus nostris utilissimum; Quem ad modum intelligi potest ex praecipuis rerum, que in ipso tractantur capitis, Steinfurt 1611.

205 “sed plane divinam & non tantum ἀξιόπιστον, sed etiam αὐτόπιστον.” Hommius, Disputationes theologicae, II.ii.
The influence of the Arminian controversy on the concept of the authority of Scripture may have been a larger emphasis on the purity of the text and the larger cautiousness against the use of the autopistia of Scripture to contradict the Reformed confessions. We will now turn to a summary of Reformed theology that was published shortly after this controversy to check this possible influence.

4.5.2 The Synopsis Purioris Theologiae (1625)

The Synopsis of Purer Theology was used for many years as an introduction to Reformed dogmatics for the theological students at Leiden University. The authors or rather the responsible teachers of the disputations were four professors at Leiden. Johann Polyander (1568-1646) was originally a Walloon pastor who had succeeded Gomarus at Leiden in 1611 and was a member of the Synod of Dort. The three others – Andreas Rivetus (1572-1651), Antonius Thysius (1565-1640), and Anthonius Walaeus (1573-1639) – were appointed as professors after this synod. The Synopsis was published shortly after the controversy and characterized by a positive style and a moderate position.

The four disputations on the doctrine of Scripture follow the disputation on the nature of theology and precede the disputations on the attributes of God and on the Trinity. The sequence of the 52 disputations resembles the sequence of Junius’s Theses Theologicae and is probably influenced by it. The disputations are all divided into theses, according to the scholastic method. In the first disputation on Theologia, Polyander deals with the common divisions in theologia archetypa and theologia ectypa. He says that natural theology is either intrinsic as it is written in the hearts of all people, or extrinsic as a result of the contemplation of creation. The instrumental cause (causa instrumentalis) of theology is the Word of God as it is brought forth by the mouth of divinely inspired humans and recorded in holy books. The mode of revelation of theologia is subdivided by some in internum or ἐνδυνάμωσιν – merely by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit – and externum or ἐπιφάνεια – when certain organs or means are used by God. This confirms our former conclusion that the word-pair externum and internum developed from the twofold mode of revelation. Polyander also discusses the common questions whether theology is a scientia or sapientia; he does not make an exclusive decision, but leaves both possibilities open.

The Necessity and Authority of Scripture

The second disputation, by Walaeus, on “The Necessity and Authority of Scripture” opens with the statement that Scripture is the principium and fundamentum of all Christian doctrines. Scripture is the divine instrument by which God has delivered the doctrina of salvation to us through the prophets, apostles, and evangelists, who were God’s secretaries (actuarios). Walaeus defends the necessitas of Scripture against the Roman Catholics – especially the Jesuits – who teach that the Scriptures do not belong to the being but to the well being of the church and against the Libertines who discred

---

207 Synopsis, i.8.
208 Synopsis, i.15.
209 Synopsis, ii.1.
210 Synopsis, ii.3.
Scripture in order to adhere to extra-scriptural revelations of the Spirit. Then he continues with the remark that “we must further explain where its authority depends upon, or to speak clearer, how it is established for us that it is divine and αὐτόπιστος.”

Walaeus mentions two different kinds of opponents: the profane people and enemies of the church who deny the divinity of Scripture altogether and, secondly, the Roman Catholic theologians who ground its authority solely on the testimony of their church. There are two contexts in which the discussion of the final ground of the authority of Scripture is important. First Walaeus deals with the skeptics.

“Regarding those that doubt the divine nature of the whole Holy Scripture: because they miss the Spirit of Christ, they cannot be convinced by the testimonium of the Holy Spirit that is stronger than all arguments.” Therefore other weapons must be used against them either to draw them slowly to the obedience of Christ or to condemn them for their unwillingness. Walaeus mentions three kinds of arguments. He takes the first kind from the criteria or notae by which the trustworthiness and truth of any historical report is asserted, for instance that the authors are trustworthy persons or eyewitnesses and not subject to bribery. These criteria are abundantly present in Scripture more than in any other, human, writings. He takes the second kind from the notae of the true religion that is revealed in the Scriptures. In the Christian religion the true God is acknowledged and worshiped and the method (ratio) through which sinful humans can be reconciled with God is revealed. “The third and most important kind of arguments is taken from the sure notae of the divine character that God has been pleased to show forth peculiarly in Holy Scripture.” Thus Walaeus draws three concentric circles: the marks of truth in general, the marks of religious truth, and the marks of Scripture. Elaborating on the third he says that for those whose eyes are opened by the Spirit of God the divine character of Scripture is clear in all places. Some passages, however, clearly manifest God as Author to all people and not only to believers. The notae that Walaeus mentions are: (1) the miracles that have accompanied the Word of God; (2) the content of Scripture under which Walaeus arranges the dogmata of Scripture for example the doctrine of the Trinity, the prophetiae of Scripture for example of the coming of the Messiah, and the promissiones of Scripture to those who believe in Christ and of which the true believers feel the effect; (3) the form (forma) of Scripture, the

---

212 Synopsis, ii.ii.28.

213 “Quod eos attinet, qui totius S. Scripturae divinitatem in dubium vocant, cum illi Spiritu Christi adhuc sint vacui, ex Spiritus Sancti testimonio, quod omnibus argumentis est validius, convinci non possunt.” Synopsis, ii.12.

214 Synopsis, ii.13-ii.28.

215 “Tertium vero argumenti genus et praecipuum petitur a certis divinitatis notis, quas Deus in S. Scriptura peculiariter exstare voluit.” Synopsis, 2.21.

216 Synopsis, ii.23.
consistency of all the doctrines and its goal (finis) in the glory of God and the salvation of humans. Next comes (4) the divine effect of Scripture: the lies of Satan disappear, wherever the Word of God enters in, and (5) the additional circumstances (adjuncta) – for instance the antiquity of Scripture – close the row of the notae of Scripture as argumentum for its authority over against unbelievers. Walaeus trusts that all those who undertake the serious reading and meditating of Scripture with a sincere heart will experience the divine character of these books.217

Walaeus makes a distinction between the testimonium of the Spirit for believers and detailed argumentation for unbelievers. Through this argumentation he explains the foundation of the authority of Scripture and shows why it is divine and αὐτόπιστος for us. The autopistia of Scripture forms the “objective” and demonstrable side of the medal, while the testimonium is reserved for the “subjective” side. At the background of this detailed argumentation stands the Arminian controversy. Walaeus explicitly warns against the heresy of Socinus – and some other Christians – who taught that the authors of Scripture could have erred on minor points.218 There is no doubt that he had the Arminians in mind with the “other Christians.”

Walaeus is much briefer in refuting the Roman Catholic position that the church has more authority than Scripture or that the authority of Scripture quoad nos depends exclusively on the testimony of the church.219 He is willing to acknowledge the task of the church to vindicate the divine character of Scripture against human attacks but this task is only a service (ministerium). The authority of Scripture must be greater than the authority of the church, because the church can err, while Scripture cannot.

And also because the testimony (testimonium) of the Holy Spirit, that all true sheep of Christ have in common (John 10), and the divine signs (notae) that display themselves in holy Scripture are of much greater authority and weight also for us (quoad nos) than merely the testimony of the church, for this testimony is only a human persuasion, while the Holy Spirit engenders saving and divine faith in our hearts through those divine signs (notae).220

The last clause is of importance for the relation between the testimonium and the evidences. In the detailed argumentation it seems as if Walaeus makes a sharp distinction between the testimonium and the notae, but here he says that the Spirit works faith through the divine notae of Scripture. As we have seen, Whitaker says that the testimonium gives power (vis) to the evidences and Junius that the testimonium is one of the evidences, though it is greater than the others. The way in which Walaeus expresses himself indicates a development in Reformed orthodoxy at this point.

The Canon as the Self-Convincing Witness and Judge
The third disputatio, by Thysius, deals with the canon. God in his providence has watched over the selection and preservation – out of all that was divinely spoken and 217 Synopsis, ii.27.

218 Synopsis, ii.28.
219 Synopsis, ii.29.
220 “denique quia Spiritus Sancti testimonium, quod omnibus veris Christi ovibus commune est, Joh. 10. item notae illae divinae, quae in Sacra Scriptura se produnt, majoris multo sint auctoritatis et ponderis, etiam quoad nos, quam solum Ecclesiae testimonium, cum Ecclesiae hoc testimonium persuasionem non nisi humanam: Spiritus Sanctus autem, per Scripturae illas divinas notas, fidem salvificam et divinam animis nostris ingeneret.” Synopsis, ii.31.
written – of those books that would become a canon or rule for the whole church.\textsuperscript{221} God’s original revelation was broader than the present canon. Dealing with the writing down (scriptio) of Scripture he says that the \textit{causa efficiens} of this writing is the Triune God who uses human instruments. “The mode of writing (\textit{modus scriptorius}) was thus: God inspired and dictated to the writers as real secretaries who wrote according to a certain formula or assisted and guided them as investigators and authors.”\textsuperscript{222} There were differences between Moses, who received the words of God \textit{expressis verbis}, and Luke who composed his gospel. The human writers were not passive in the process of writing, but used their mind and memory and wrote in diverse styles and arrangements. Nevertheless, they were constantly superintended by the Spirit, “who so guided and ruled them, that he preserved them everywhere from any error in mind, memory, language, and pen.”\textsuperscript{223} Thysius also discusses the authenticity of the text:

Moreover, that edition of Scripture is to be reckoned as authentic that is written with the hand of the author (\textit{auvtogra,fwj}), that is first and originally brought forth through divine authority, which is the archetype (\textit{avrce,tupon}) itself or its transcript (\textit{avpo,grafon}), which is the copy.\textsuperscript{224} The authors of the \textit{Synopsis} are aware of the distinction between the autographs and the copies of Scripture, but do not deal with the questions of textual criticism. They seem to assume that the copies faithfully represent the original reading. Regarding the translations, Thysius says that only the original or autographic writings are authentic, but the translations are also the Word of God as far as they are accurate.\textsuperscript{225} Still it is wrong to declare the Septuagint or the Vulgate authentic. In discussing the canon Thysius acknowledges that some of the books were intended for general use in the church and others – like the epistles – for a particular use, but also these were conserved and communicated to others by the extra-ordinary providence of God, who knew what was good for the church.\textsuperscript{226} The acceptance of the canonical books was not a voluntary, but a necessary act.\textsuperscript{227} This acceptance took place at the time when the church was still able to judge about them with certainty and rested either on the ordinary witness of the author and of other faithful witnesses of its authenticity or on the extraordinary judgment of the prophets, at the time when the gift of prophecy still

\begin{footnotes}
\item[221] \textit{Synopsis}, iii.1.
\item[222] “Modus scriptionis hic fuit: modo Deus inspirantis et dictantis, Scriptores vero amanuensium, et ad certam formulam scribentium, Exod. 34, 27.28. Apoc. 2, 1. etc.; modo assistentis et dirigentis, Matth. 22, 43. Hebr. 1, 1, ipsi vero, commentantium et auctorum rationem habuerunt, Luc. 1, 1.3.” \textit{Synopsis}, iii.7.
\item[223] “praesidente tamen perpetuo Spiritu S., qui ita eos egit et rexit, ut ab omni errore mentis, memoriae, linguae et calami, ubique praeservarentur, 2 Sam. 23, 1.2. 1 Cor. 7,25.40.” \textit{Synopsis}, iii.7.
\item[225] \textit{Synopsis}, iii.11.
\item[226] \textit{Synopsis}, iii.13.
\item[227] “idque non libero aliquo Ecclesiae actu, sed necessaria suspicione.” \textit{Synopsis}, iii.13.
\end{footnotes}
functioned in the church. This is the reason why the canonicity of some books was doubted by some, after the time of the apostles and prophets had ceased.

Thysius gives five reasons why the apocrypha are to be rejected: (1) they were not brought forth by the prophetic Spirit, because they were written at a time when the prophetic gift had ceased, (2) they were not placed in the ark or next to the ark of Moses (3) they were not written in Hebrew nor accepted by the Jews, (4) they were not acknowledged but held as counterfeit by Christ, the apostles, and the early church and were later only accepted with difficulty and to a certain extent, and (5) they taught fables and absurd things that did not correspond with Scripture.

After having discussed how the canon was accepted by the early church Thysius concludes:

This Scripture alone is the principle (principium) from which and the substance (materia) out of which all saving truth is to be deduced, the canon and norm by which every true and so every false doctrine of things divine must be measured. Therefore it is a witness and self-convincing (αυτοπιστος) and irrefragable judge that has its own evidence, by which every controversy raised about divine things should be judged.

In his discussion of the canon Thysius does not refer to the autopistia of Scripture or to the testimonium of the Spirit, but to God’s providence and to the prophetic gift of judgment in the early church. Once the canon is established it must necessarily be a witness and a self-convincing witness (testis) and judge (judex). These juridical metaphors not only remind us of the terminology in the Institutes but also imply that the autopistia of Scripture refers to the hermeneutical principle that Scripture is its own interpreter (Scriptura sui ipsius interpres). Thysius continues:

The criterion then or the judicial rule can be summarized in the axioms: (1) Whatever is contained in it or agrees with it either expressly or by a valid inference, is true doctrine. (2) What disagrees with it must necessarily be false. (3) Whatever is not contained in it, although it does not plainly disagree with it is not a doctrine necessary to salvation.

The autopistia of Scripture is the axiom of these axioms. Scripture must necessarily be αυτοπιστος in order to be the final judge of every theological controversy.

---

228 Synopsis, iii.14.
229 Synopsis, iii.15.
230 Thysius refers to Deut. 31 and to Epiphanius of Salamis (c. 315-403) who says that the Wisdom of Solomon and Jesus Sirach are helpful and useful, but were not kept in the Ark of the Covenant. Epiphanius, De mensuribus et ponderibus, 4, PG 43:244. Cf. Synopsis, iii.38.
231 Synopsis, iii.38.
233 “XIX Κριτήριον autem, seu Norma judicii, hisce axiomatic comprehenditur. 1. Quicquid ea continetur, aut cum ea vel expresse, vel firma consequentia consentit, verum dogma est. 2. Quod dissentit, falsum esse necesse est. 3. Quicquid autem ea non continetur, quamvis simpliciter ab ea non dissentiat, non est necessarium ad salutem dogma.” Synopsis, iii.19. Cf. Heppe, Reformed Dogmatics, 21.
4.5.3 Summarizing Remarks

The emphases in the Synopsis confirm our impression that the Arminian controversy influenced the Reformed concept of the authority of Scripture. Although Arminius is not mentioned in the disputations on Scripture, still the Reformed position is fenced off against Socinus and “some other Christians” who rejected the infallibility of Scripture. Probably the careful definition of inspiration must also be read in the light of this controversy. The autopistia of Scripture must safeguard Reformed doctrine and therefore it is not interpreted in the sense of the certainty of the individual believer regarding Scripture, but as a general characteristic of Scripture, that can be proved to unbelievers by a detailed argumentation.

The evidences of Scripture are the means by which the Spirit works. Waleaus calls the arguments notae or criteria of Scripture and says that the Spirit works faith through the divine notae of Scripture. For Whitaker and Junius the Spirit gives power (vis) to the arguments, but here the Spirit works through the arguments.

The authenticity of the original text seems to become more important in the context of the Arminian controversy. Thysius makes a distinction between the autographs and the copies of Scripture; both are authentic as long as the copies are faithful. Although the translations are the Word of God as far as they are accurate, they are not to be held as authentic.

The autopistia of Scripture is not the foundation of the canon, but rather a logically necessary characteristic of the canon. Thysius says that Scripture is the principium of truth, and the canon and norm of doctrine, and that it therefore is αὐτόπιστος as a witness and judge. This is in line with Junius’s writings, and is probably due to the connection with the scholastic technical term principium. The way in which the autopistia of Scripture functions in the Synopsis as a logical necessity flows from the structure introduced by Junius in which the discussion of the nature of theology precedes the discussion of Scripture. At this point we disagree with Muller, who says:

The Reformers’ clear sense of the self-authenticating character of Scripture – the a priori character of Scripture as a self-evidencing norm – flowed directly into the orthodox identification of Scripture as the principium cognoscendi theologiae: principia, of their very nature, stand prior to and provide the grounds for a form of knowledge.\(^{234}\)

There is continuity in the use of the terms, but there is no immediate connection between the self-convincing character of Scripture in the Reformation and the Reformed orthodox identification of Scripture as the principium cognoscendi theologiae.

4.6 Francis Turretin (1623-1687)

The second important controversy within the Reformed ranks was occasioned by the theological faculty of Saumur where Moïse Amyraut (1594-1664) taught hypothetic universalism and Louis Cappel (1585-1658) expressed his opinion that the vocalization of the Old Testament originated from the Masoretes and did not belong to the inspired text. The theologians of Saumur considered themselves orthodox, but contemporary Reformed theologians found the implications of their hermeneutics dangerous for the Reformed doctrine of the authority of Scripture.\(^{235}\)

\(^{234}\) Muller, PRRD 2\(^2\), 162.

\(^{235}\) Muller, PRRD 2\(^2\), 124.
One of the Reformed theologians who was deeply involved in the Amyrauldian controversy was Francis Turretin. He completed his studies at Geneva in 1644 and made a study trip to Leiden, Utrecht, Paris, and Saumur. He served the Italian congregation in Geneva as a pastor and later combined his pastoral care for the Italians with a professorial chair until his death in 1687. He was one of the most influential theologians supporting the Formula Consensus Helvetica (1675). His Institutio theologiae elencticae consists of three volumes, originally published between 1679 and 1685. Although the debate with Saumur had already ended at the time when Turretin wrote this work, we have chosen the Institutio, because it gives a summary of the Reformed orthodox reaction to the conflict with Saumur in the context of a complete theological system.

4.6.1 Principium Externum and Principium Internum

In the first locus, “On Theology,” Turretin deals with several topics that are commonly discussed at the beginning of a theological system. One of his questions is whether theology is theoretical or practical. Turretin concludes that theology is theoretico-practical. One of the proofs for this mixed character of theology is that both Word and Spirit have a theoretical and a practical side. The Word teaches the things that have to be done (the law) and the things that have to be believed (the gospel) and the Spirit likewise is both the Spirit of truth and of sanctification. In this context Turretin calls he Word the principium externum and the Spirit the principium internum of theology.

The next question is whether human reason is the principle and rule by which the doctrines of the Christian religion and theology ought to be measured. Turretin denies this against the Socinians. Turretin probably follows one of the disputationes of Voetius in the way he develops his answer, as we will see. It is possible that he also derives the distinction principium externum and principium internum from him. Turretin makes a distinction between reason taken subjectively as one of the faculties of the soul or objectively as the natural light that is given to us. He says: “The principium that comes into question here must be first and αὐτόπιστος and all the truths and articles of faith must be primarily deduced from it and ultimately resolved by it.” The question is not whether reason is the instrument by which (instrumentum quo) or the medium through which (medium per quod) we can be drawn to faith; reason can be both. But the question is whether it is the first principle from which (principium ex quo) the doctrines of faith are proved or the foundation upon which (fundamentum quo) they are built; this is denied by Turretin.

---

236 With his characterization of theology as theoretical and practical, contemplative and active, Turretin represented the general orthodox Reformed position. Muller, PRRD 1, 352.
239 Turretin, Institutio, I.viii.4. Cf. Turretin, Institutes 1, 24. There are three main authorities for Turretin: the Word of God, the tradition of the church and human reason. Only Scripture has absolute authority; the other two have relative authority. E.P. Meijering, Reformierte Scholastik und patristische Theologie: die Bedeutung des Väterbeweises in der Institutio Theologiae
In the formal introduction on theology as a science the term αὐτόπιστος has a technical function and is used to define a principium. Now the autopistia of Scripture as a logical necessity precedes the actual discussion of the authority of Scripture. It is already clear in the prolegomena that Scripture must be αὐτόπιστος, because it is the principium of theology. This shift of the autopistia from the doctrine of Scripture to the discussion of theology as a science is foreshadowed by the introduction of a separate locus “On Theology” by Junius and by the discussion of the canon in the Synopsis, where the autopistia of Scripture is seen as a logically necessary characteristic of Scripture.

4.6.2 Scripture Proved by the Notae

The concept of the autopistia of Scripture is developed in the second locus titled “On Holy Scriptures.” The Word of God is the sole principium of theology and therefore the question concerning its necessitas comes before all other things. Turretin deals with the authoritas of Scripture. The authority of Scripture depends on its origin; because it is from God it must be authentic and divine. There is a controversy regarding the authority of Scripture, not only with the atheists and the heathen for whom Scripture is just like any other book, but also with those Christians who make its authority depend upon the testimony of the church at least as far as we are concerned (quoad nos). “As to the former class, the question is whether holy Scripture is truly αὐτόπιστος and divine.” The discussion with Rome, however, regards the question how we can know that it is divine or upon which testimony our faith in its authenticity rests.

Dealing with the atheists and skeptics, Turretin says that Scripture proves itself to be divine, when it calls itself God-inspired. This argument, however, cannot be used against those who reject Scripture altogether; therefore Scripture also shows itself to be divine through the marks (notae) God has impressed on it. Turretin mentions external marks such as (1) its antiquity, (2) its duration and preservation, (3) the sincerity of its writers, and (4) some adjuncts, like the martyrs, who sealed it with their blood, the testimony of adversaries, and the consensus of all Christians on the authority of Scripture although they differ in many other things. He also mentions internal marks, which are more significant: (1) the content (materia) of Scripture, (2) its style, (3) its form especially the harmony between the Testaments and between the individual books, (4) its goal in the glory of God and the salvation of humanity, and (5) its effect as a two-edged sword that pierces the soul and generates faith in the minds of hearers. These marks confirm and assist faith, for although faith does not rest on demonstration, it can be supported by arguments, especially at its beginning. Before we can believe, the divine authority of the witness whom we believe must be established. The testimony of a witness is not trustworthy (ἀξιόπιστος), if suitable reasons of believing him are 240 Turretin, Institutio, II.i.1. Cf. Turretin, Institutes 1, 55.

---

241 “Quoad illos, Quaeritur, An Scriptura Sacra sit vere αὐτόπιστος & divina?” Turretin, Institutio, II.iv.1 Cf. Turretin, Institutes 1, 62.
242 Turretin, Institutio, II.iv.6. Cf. Turretin, Institutes 1, 63.
243 Turretin, Institutio, II.iv.8. Cf. Turretin, Institutes 1, 63.
244 Turretin, Institutio, II.iv.9. Cf. Turretin, Institutes 1, 63-64.
Thus Scripture demonstrates itself as divine to atheists and skeptics, but also believers are supported by the notae of the divine authority of Scripture. According to Turretin, there are suitable reasons to trust the witness of Scripture.

After dealing with some seeming contradictions in Scripture in the fifth question, Turretin turns to the Roman Catholics in the sixth question, discussing how the divine authority of the Scriptures becomes known to us. Turretin denies that the authority of Scripture depends on the testimony of the church either in itself (in se) or for us (quoad nos). Scripture cannot be authentic in itself without also being it for us, because the same arguments which prove its authority in itself ought to induce us to assent to it. Turretin does not deny that the testimony of the church has value, but maintains that Scripture primarily and principally is to be believed on account of itself or of its notae and not on account of the church.

The debate with Rome concerns the argumentum that the Spirit uses to convince us of the truth of Scripture. It is either the immediate argument of the testimony (testimonium) of the church or the rational argument based on the marks (notae) of Scripture itself. A threefold question can arise about the divinity of Scripture, the first, concerning the argument on account of which (argumentum propter quod) I believe; the second, concerning the principle (principium) or efficient cause through which (causa efficiens a qua) I am led to believe; the third, concerning the means and instrument through which (medium & instrumentum per quod) I believe. For Turretin Scripture with its notae is the argument on account of which we believe; the Holy Spirit is the efficient cause and principle from which we are led to believe and the church is the instrument and means through which we believe. If the question is why we believe Scripture to be divine, Turretin answers: “on account of the Scripture itself which by its marks proves itself to be such.” But if we are asked where this faith comes from, it is from the Holy Spirit who produces it in us; finally, if we are asked by what means or instrument we believe it, it is through the church, by which God delivers Scripture to us. In the meantime the notae of the divinity of Scripture from the discussion with the atheists and skeptics appear to be of importance for believers also. They do not only confirm them and assist them at the first beginning, but the notae are most fundamental argumentum propter quod for their faith. They believe Scripture on account of the fact that Scripture demonstrates itself to be divine through these notae.

Turretin underlines that the authority of Scripture does not depend on the testimony of the church and refers to the text already used by Calvin (Eph. 2,20). The church is founded on Scripture and not the other way around. He illustrates this primary authority of Scripture with the principia of science, which are known through themselves. Basil the Great says that “it is necessary that the first principles of every science should be...”

---

self-evident (ἀνεξετάσιος).” Turretin argues that if God has stamped such marks upon all principia that they can be known at once by all, he must have also placed them upon Scripture as the sacred principium that is necessary for our salvation. The autopistia of Scripture is logically necessary because Scripture is the principium of theology. This in turn serves as an argument to prove that Scripture does not depend on the church, but is known by its own notae. In other words the autopistia of Scripture proves that the authority of Scripture is demonstrated by its own notae.

A little later Turretin refers to Aristotle who says that there are certain axioms that do not have an external reason for their truth: “They are not only ἀυτόπιστος, but cannot be seriously denied by anyone of a sound mind. Therefore, since Scripture is the first principle and primary and infallible truth, is it strange to say that it can be proved by itself?” Turretin accuses the Roman Catholics of circular reasoning, when they prove Scripture by the church and the church by Scripture. If we ask why they believe the witness of Scripture regarding the infallibility of the church to be ἀυτόπιστος, they reply that the church has made them sure of it. Turretin gives some examples of the autopistia of Scripture; as light is immediately known by its own brightness, food by its peculiar sweetness and an odor by its fragrance, so Scripture may easily be distinguished of itself by a believer. These analogies remind us of Calvin’s Institutes, but there is a shift of emphasis. For Calvin, Scripture can be proved by its evidences to unbelievers, but believers accept it as ἀυτόπιστος – independent of proofs and demonstrations – through the testimonium of the Spirit. For Turretin believers accept Scripture because it proves itself to be divine by its own notae and the Spirit is the efficient cause of this faith that rests upon the marks of Scripture.

4.6.3 The Authentic Text

After discussing the canon (questions seven and eight) and the apocrypha (question nine) Turretin turns to questions about the integrity of the text. The tenth question is whether the original texts of the Old and New Testaments have come to us pure and uncorrupted. Turretin affirms this against the Roman Catholics. He explains that by “original texts” he does not mean the original writings (autographa) from the hands of the authors, but the copies (apographa), which record for us the Word of God in the same words into which the sacred writers committed it under the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit. Turretin acknowledges the importance of textual criticism; the variant readings in the Greek and Hebrew copies witness to the fact that errors have crept into many codices, through the effect of time, the carelessness of copyists or the malice of Jews and heretics. Turretin and the Reformed orthodox in general, however, 250 Turretin, Institutio, II.vi.11. Cf. Turretin, Institutes 1, 89. We discussed this passage from Basil in § 3.3.1. Cf. PG 30:104-105.

---

251 “id est, quod non modo est ἀυτόπιστος, verum a nemine serio negari potest qui modo sit rationis compos. Cum ergo Scriptura sit primum Principium, & prima & infallibilis Veritas, quid mirum si per se ipsam probari dicatur?” Turretin, Institutio, II.vi.18. Cf. Turretin, Institutes 1, 91. He refers to the Posterior Analytics, although, as we have seen, Aristotle does not use the term ἀυτόπιστος.

252 Turretin, Institutio, II.vi.24. Cf. Turretin, Institutes 1, 92-93.

253 Turretin, Institutio, II.x.2. Cf. Turretin, Institutes 1, 106.
believed that the original text can always be restored by a collation of the manuscripts.\textsuperscript{254}

The issue with Rome regards the question whether the original text has been so corrupted that it can no longer be held as the judge of controversies and the norm by which all versions without exception are to be judged.\textsuperscript{255} The Council of Trent had pronounced the normative status of the Vulgate and had declared that it should be owned as authentic (\textit{authentica}).\textsuperscript{256} The Reformed orthodox rejected this position and declared that only the original text was authentic.

Turretin gives seven arguments for the pure preservation of the text: (1) the providence of God does not allow that the books in which the doctrine of salvation is preserved have been corrupted; (2) the faithfulness of the church and (3) the great and superstitious care of the Jews for the manuscripts have preserved Scripture. Turretin mentions (4) the Masoretes who counted and recorded in writing, all variations in pointing and writing of the verses and words and even of individual letters; he refers to (5) the large number of copies, and asserts (6) that if the sources were corrupted, it was done either before Christ – which is impossible because Christ cannot have used corrupted books – or afterwards by the Jews – which is impossible, because the copies present among Christians make that useless and because there is no trace of such corruption. Finally, (7) he says that the Jews neither desired to corrupt the sources nor could have done so, due to the watchfulness of the Christians.\textsuperscript{257} The difference between the Septuagint and the original text does not imply that the text is corrupt, but rather that the translation is defective.\textsuperscript{258}

The \textit{autopistia} and authenticity of Scripture are connected in Reformed orthodoxy. Turretin’s eleventh question is whether the Hebrew version of the Old Testament and the Greek one of the New Testament are the only authentic versions and he affirms this against the Roman Catholics.\textsuperscript{259} According to Turretin, an authentic writing is one of which we can be entirely sure that it has proceeded from the author whose name it bears and that everything is written just as he himself wished. The \textit{apographa} are lost, but the \textit{autographa} are sufficient to reconstruct the original text through textual criticism. Nevertheless, he reserves the \textit{autopistia} for the \textit{autographa}.\textsuperscript{260} In this paragraph Turretin makes a distinction between primary and secondary authenticity. A document can be authentic either primarily and originally or secondarily and derivatively. “That writing is primarily authentic which is \textit{autopistij} and to which credit is and ought to be \textsuperscript{254} Turretin, \textit{Institutio}, II.xii.14. Cf. Turretin, \textit{Institutes} 1, 121. The critical establishment of the text of the Bible was understood by the Reformed orthodox as fundamental to the task of the exegete and theologian. Muller, \textit{PRRD} 2\textsuperscript{2}, 398.

\textsuperscript{255} Turretin, \textit{Institutio}, II.x.3. Cf. Turretin, \textit{Institutes} 1, 106.

\textsuperscript{256} Muller, \textit{PRRD} 2\textsuperscript{2}, 401-402.

\textsuperscript{257} Turretin, \textit{Institutio}, II.x.5-7. Cf. Turretin, \textit{Institutes} 1, 107-108.

\textsuperscript{259} Turretin, \textit{Institutio}, II.xi. Cf. Turretin, \textit{Institutes} 1, 112.

\textsuperscript{260} Muller writes that Turretin and the other Reformed orthodox argued that the authenticity and infallibility of Scripture must be identified in and of the \textit{apographa}, not in and of lost \textit{autographa}. This is correct, but it can be added that for Turretin the \textit{autopistia} belonged especially to the \textit{autographa} and that exactly for that reason it must be possible to reconstruct them from the \textit{apographa}. Cf. Muller, \textit{PRRD} 2\textsuperscript{2}, 415.
The secondarily authentic writings are all the copies accurately and faithfully taken from the originals. The autographs of for instance Moses are primarily authentic and the accurate copies are secondarily authentic.

The question rises why Turretin reserves the autopistia for the lost autographs. Although he does not state this with so many words, the reason seems to be that the logically necessary autopistia of the autographa leads to the logically necessary authenticity of the apographa. In other words the copies must be reliable, because the original handwriting is the self-convincing foundation of our theology. The autopistia belongs to the autographa and for that reason it must necessarily be possible to reconstruct them from the apographa. The underlying assumption is that God in his providence must have superintended the accurate transmission of the text. God’s providentia is the main argument for the integrity of the text.

Turretin also deals with several objections against the authenticity of the Hebrew and Greek texts. The variant readings that occur in the manuscripts do not destroy the authenticity of Scripture, because they are easily recognized and understood from the context or from the collation of the better manuscripts. Many are of such nature that, although they differ, yet they agree in meaning and the original text can always be restored by a collation of the various manuscripts. The passages that are offered to prove that the text is defective, like the history of the adulteress (John 8), the Johannine Comma in 1 John 5,7, and the account of Christ’s resurrection in Mark 16, are all regarded as original by Turretin.

Some of his opponents refer to the vowel points, but, according to Turretin, these points are not merely a human innovation of the Masoretes, but have divine and infallible authority. The problem of the vowel points occupied the Protestant orthodox during the whole seventeenth century. In the polemical debate with the Counter-Reformation the textual issue became a doctrinal one, because the late dating of the vowel points justified the claim of Trent that the Vulgate was authentic. According to Turretin, even if the points have been added at a late date, it does not follow that they are merely human, because the points do not express the judgment of the rabbis, but the accepted meaning of the text. Therefore even if the points are not part of the original with regard to their shape, they are with regard to their meaning. The distinction between the points as such and the meaning of the points is echoed in the Formula Consensus Helvetica (1675), which says that the Hebrew original of the Old Testament is “not only in its consonants, but in its vowels – either the vowel points themselves, or 261 “Primario authenticum est id scriptum quod est οὐτόπιστων, cui sua per se fides constat, & cui ob seipsum plane creditur ac credi debet.” Turretin, Institutio, II.xi.3. Cf. Turretin, Institutes 1, 113.

---

264 Muller, PRRD 2², 406-407.

at least the power of the points – not only in its matter, but in its words, inspired by God.” 266 The object of the Formula was to guard the authority and integrity of the original text and not to decide questions of grammar or textual criticism. 267

4.6.4 Louis Cappel
In the twelfth question Turretin dealt with the internal Reformed controversy on textual criticism. Louis Cappel was of the opinion that the text of Scripture could be corrected by comparison with the old translations or by conjectural emendation. Cappel had studied theology at Sedan and Saumur, and Arabic at Oxford. At the age of twenty-eight he accepted the chair of Hebrew at Saumur, and twenty years afterwards was appointed professor of theology. In his anonymously published Arcanum punctationis revelatum he defended the view that the system of vowel points and accents did not date from Moses or from Ezra and the Great Synagogue, but had been inserted by the Masoretes no earlier than the fifth century. 268 In his Critica sacra, published in 1650, he used readings from the ancient translations and conjectural emendation to reconstruct the biblical text. 269

To understand why Turretin and the other orthodox Reformed theologians rejected Cappel we will have to keep in mind that Cappel’s views weakened the Reformed position in the debate with Roman Catholicism. For Turretin the authority of Scripture as the principium of theology falls away if the authenticity of the text is disputed. Scripture is αὐτοπιστος and therefore the authenticity of the text must stand. Turretin says that since the authentia of the sacred text is the primary foundation of faith, nothing is more important than to preserve it against all attacks of those who reject it or weaken it in any way. 270 He interprets the publications of his French colleague as an attack on the authority of Scripture, although he acknowledges that this is not Cappel’s intention. 271

Turretin does not want to bring the reputation of Cappel, “who in other ways deserves esteem from the church of God,” into discredit, but he upholds the unimpaired

267 Schaff, Creeds of Christendom 1, 487. The Formula was not intended as a new confession of faith, but as an explanatory appendix to the former confessions. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom 1, 486.

269 L. Cappel, Critica sacra, sive de variis quae in sacris Veteris Testamenti libris occurrunt lectionibus, Paris 1650. He had completed the manuscript in 1639, but it took some time to find a publisher. F.P. Van Stam, The Controversy over the Theology of Saumur, 1635-1650: Disrupting Debates among the Huguenots in Complicated Circumstances [Studies of the Institute Pierre Bayle, vol. 19], Amsterdam 1988, 257-261.

270 Turretin, Institutio, II.xii.1. Cf. Turretin, Institutes 1, 116. In the opening paragraphs of his tract on The Divine Original, Authority and Self-evidencing Light and Power of the Scriptures John Owen asserts that “the whole Word of God, in every letter and tittle, as given from Him by inspiration, is preserved without corruption.” Owen, Works 16, 301.

271 Turretin, Institutio, II.xii.18. Cf. Turretin, Institutes 1, 122.

180
authenticity of the text of Scripture against those who adopt these new hypotheses or call them insignificant. Summarizing Cappel’s teaching, Turretin says that, according to Cappel, the vowel points can be changed whenever their meaning is absurd, because they are merely human, and even the consonants may be changed if necessary. It is also lawful to follow the ancient translations, whether Greek, Aramaic, or Latin if they render a meaning that is equally good and appropriate or superior to the Hebrew manuscripts. If there is a weakness in the present reading and it is possible to find a more appropriate reading through the power of sound reason or by conjectural emendation, it is permissible to rephrase the Hebrew text. Cappel teaches that the Hebrew manuscripts behind the Septuagint and other translations are different from those that have been preserved and therefore the authentic or original text must be gathered from a collation of all the Hebrew manuscripts and of the ancient translations.

Turretin rejects this position, because from Cappel’s hypothesis it follows that there is no authentic text in which we can rest with entire confidence. If all the discrepancies between the ancient versions and the present Hebrew text are variant readings of Hebrew manuscripts, why do the patristic or Jewish ancient writers not mention these manuscripts? Moreover, in this way the ancient translation are of the same significance as the original text; the Hebrew does not have more authority than the ancient translations except when it is found to be more appropriate and the Hebrew is subordinated to the translations when its reading is difficult. If the authentic reading of Scripture must be sought by comparison with the old translations and by our own judgment and critical ability, then the canon of authentic reading is merely what seems appropriate to us. Then the determination of the authentic reading will be the work of human reason and will (arbitrium) not of the Holy Spirit. Human reason will be placed in the citadel and regarded as the rule and principium of faith. If conjectural emendations can be made on the sacred text, this damages the certainty of the authentic text and makes everything doubtful and subjected to the judgment of every individual interpreter. Everyone will think that he can give good reasons for his emendations and there will be continual struggles and disputes among the commentators. This would take away the great difference between a human writing that is subject to error and the one that is divine and inspired. Finally, if the existing Hebrew text is given no pricacy over the old translations then Protestants have struggled in vain against the Roman Catholics when they affirmed the sole authority of the existing Hebrew text.

At this point two things can be concluded: Turretin did not reject textual criticism, but the use of non-Hebrew texts and of conjectural emendation. The Reformed orthodoxy in general accepted the establishment of the text of the Bible on the basis of a comparison of available codices, but not the emendation of the text in the original language on the basis either of pure conjecture or of the witness of the ancient translations; an emendation was not accepted if it was not confirmed by the text in the original languages. Moreover, in Reformed orthodoxy the textual issue became a doctrinal issue due to the polemics against Rome. Turretin rejected Cappel’s position,

---

272 Turretin, Institutio, II.xi.2. Cf. Turretin, Institutes 1, 117.
273 Turretin, Institutio, II.xi.3. Cf. Turretin, Institutes 1, 117-118.
274 Turretin, Institutio, II.xi.7-12. Cf. Turretin, Institutes 1, 119-121.
275 Muller, PRRD 2, 399.
because he was afraid that it would lead to uncertainty regarding the principium of theology. If Cappel’s extreme views of textual emendation through conjecture were followed, the result could be that every scholar would create his own Bible. Reasoning from the autopistia of Scripture as a logical necessity, the authenticity of the text logically followed and therefore the system of Reformed theology was in danger if the domino stone of the integrity of the text toppled.

4.6.5 Contemporary Translations
In the thirteenth question Turretin discusses the relationship between the original text and the vernacular versions of Scripture. These translations are necessary because (1) people from all languages ought to read and contemplate the Scriptures; (2) the gospel is preached in all languages; (3) it has been the practice of the church to use them in their liturgical worship in the vernacular; (4) there are numerous Greek versions of the Old Testament. The translations are like streams that flow from the fountain of the original text; unlike the originals, they only have human authority, but they do not lack all authority. Turretin distinguishes between the divine authority of the substantia of the doctrine, which is the internal form of Scripture, and the divine authority of the exact words, the external form of Scripture, the accidens of writing. The original text has both authorities, while the translation only has the first.\(^{276}\) The original is αυτόπιστος, while the translation is not.\(^{277}\)

Turretin uses the term αυτόπιστος also in other chapters of his work. When he discusses the prophetic office of Christ he calls the doctrina of Christ αυτόπιστος and divine.\(^{278}\) In his ecclesiology he explains the difference between Scripture and confession. Confessions are not absolutely but only hypothetically necessary, for sometimes the church has been without confessions. Their authority is of great importance, but still sinks below the authority of the Scripture. “For the latter is a rule, but they are the thing ruled. It alone is self-convincing (αυτόπιστος) with respect to words as well as to things, divine and infallible; they, as divine in things, still in words and manner of treatment are human writings.”\(^{279}\) Turretin says the same of the councils of the church; they are of great weight in the church, inasmuch as their judgment, although not αυτόπιστος, is still public and proceeds with the authority granted by Christ.\(^{280}\)

4.6.6 Summarizing Remarks
Although a more detailed study is necessary to do full justice to Turretin’s concept of the authority of Scripture, it is possible to draw the following conclusions.

1. Turretin uses the term in the locus De Theologia, the formal introduction on theology as a science. The term αυτόπιστος has a technical function and is used to define the principia. The autopistia of Scripture flows as a logical consequence from the fact that Scripture is the principium of theology. If God has made all principia of science self-convincing, he must have also made Scripture as the sacred principium of theology self-convincing. Turretin also uses the word-pair externum and internum for the relationship of Word and Spirit, possibly influenced by Voetius.

---

\(^{278}\) “Eundem Verba Dei loqui & constat doctrinam αυτόπιστον & divinam afferrer censendum est.”

2. The evidences for the authority of Scripture are very important in his judgement. Scripture proves itself by the marks (notae) God has impressed on it. Faith does not rest on demonstration, but is supported by these arguments, because they show that the testimony of Scripture is trustworthy, especially to new believers. Turretin says that the notae of the divinity of Scripture demonstrate that it is divine. The Spirit primarily uses these marks and not the testimony of the church to assure believers of the divine origin of Scripture. There is in Reformed orthodoxy an increasingly apologetic emphasis on the objective notae of Scripture.\(^{281}\)

3. When Turretin explains the interrelationship of the testimonium of the Spirit, the witness of the church, and the notae of Scripture he uses a helpful scholastic distinction. Scripture with its notae is the argumentum propter quod of faith, the Holy Spirit is the principium or causa efficiens a qua of faith, and the church is the medium and instrumentum per quod of faith. Turretin does not deny the value of the witness of the church, but maintains that Scripture principally should be believed on account of itself or of its notae and not on account of the church. The autopistia of Scripture is the main reason for Turretin to emphasize that Scripture proves itself by its own notae. We believe Scripture because it proves itself to be divine by its own notae. The Spirit is the efficient cause of this faith that rests upon the marks of Scripture and the church is only instrumental. The primacy of the notae of Scripture flows as a logical necessity from the autopistia of Scripture. Calvin accepted Scripture as αὐτόπιστος through the testimonium of the Spirit and trusted that he could prove the authority of Scripture through the evidences if necessary. Turretin accepts Scripture because of the evidences and proves that this is logically necessary from the autopistia of Scripture as the principium of theology.

4. Finally, in the internal Reformed debate on textual criticism in general and on the authenticity of the vowel points in particular, the autopistia of Scripture has shifted to the original text of the autographa. The copies must be reliable, because the originals are the foundation of our theology. Not that Turretin uses the term αὐτόπιστος exclusively for the originals, but the autopistia of Scripture as the ultimate source of authority logically leads to the authenticity and integrity of the copies of the text. God in his providence must have watched over the integrity of the text. Turretin acknowledges the importance of textual criticism, because errors have crept into many codices, but \(^{281}\) Muller states against Rogers and McKim that “it is precisely the traditional, Aristotelian understanding of the nature of the first principle that bars any and all attempts to offer rational and empirical demonstration of the authority of Scripture.” Muller, PRRD 2\(^2\), 264. Cf. J.B. Rogers and D.K. McKim, The Authority and Interpretation of the Bible: An Historical Approach, San Francisco 1979, 205. Muller has a point, but he seems to harmonize the tension, because although the Reformed orthodox accepted that Scripture as principium was beyond demonstration, at the same time they offered a detailed demonstration of the authority of Scripture by the evidences. This tension is also present in Calvin’s Institutes, but there Scripture is αὐτόπιστος for believers.

---

rejects the use of non-Hebrew texts and of conjectural emendation, because unlimited textual criticism can lead to uncertainty regarding the principium of theology and place the arbitrary conclusions of human reason in the citadel.

4.7 Gisbert Voetius (1589-1676)
The fourth aspect of Reformed orthodoxy that we will evaluate, regards the confrontation with early modernism and especially with the philosophy of René Descartes who took the self-evident proposition ego cogito ergo sum as his methodological starting point. That Descartes’ philosophy implied a totally different view of authority and formed a threat for the Reformed orthodox concept of revelation was sharply analyzed by the leading Reformed theologians. One of them was the Dutch theologian Gisbert Voetius. He studied theology at Leiden University, served several congregations, was a delegate at the Synod of Dort, and a professor of theology and Hebrew at the Illustrious School in Utrecht in 1634, a prolific writer, and a zealous polemicist against Roman Catholics, Arminians, Cocceians, and Socinians. He labelled Descartes a “subtle atheist,” who claimed to prove God’s existence but destroyed the foundations of faith. According to Voetius, Descartes exchanged God’s revelation in Scripture for human subjectivity, because his cogito was the principle of all science and the means of arriving at certainty about God. It is interesting in the context of this study that Descartes started his philosophical considerations with the proposition that ideas we discern clare et distincte, are absolutely and undoubtedly true. It seems that the Reformed emphasis on the autopistia of Scripture stands over against the early modern emphasis on the autonomy of the human subject. Voetius criticized the Cartesian idea of a mechanical Universe, because he foresaw that the shifting conception of natural causality threatened the status of theology as a science, because it excluded an explanation of the relationship between God and creation in philosophical terms. We will not discuss the controversy with Descartes in detail, but look at a few statements of Voetius on the authority of Scripture – using ἀυτόπιστος as the key-term – and keep the controversy with Descartes in mind for our evaluation.

4.7.1 The Syllabus Problematum Theologicorum
Among Voetius’s main works are the Disputationes theologicae selectae (1648-1669), the Exercitia pietatis (1664), and the Politica ecclesiastica (1663-1676). In 1643 he published his Syllabus Problematum Theologicorum, a survey for students of the whole field of Reformed dogmatics. In every locus of the system Voetius listed the

---

282 Muller, PRRD 1^2_, 70.
quaestiones or problemata and gave a short answer: “yes,” “no,” “yes, with a distinction,” or “no, with a distinction” and the students were supposed to consider the reasons for the answers given.\(^{286}\)

In the Syllabus the divinity and authority of Scripture forms the first subject of the locus De Principiis Christianorum Dogmatum. This locus follows the loci De Theologia dealing with natural and supernatural theology and De summo bono seu beatitudine. The subjects that Voetius discusses under the heading of De Principiis are divided into primary and secondary controversiae. Some of the primary controversies regarding the authority of Scripture are with the enemies of the faith, others with the Roman Catholics and other heterodox persons.\(^{287}\) The first is with the skeptics:

Is there any certain principle of faith? We affirm this against the skeptics and deists.

Is this [principle] the external Word of God or really only the internal? We affirm the first against the enthusiasts.

Is Scripture divine or the Word of God and consequently of divine authority? We affirm.\(^{288}\) The first question identifies Scripture as the principium of faith against the skeptics and the second emphasizes that the external Word of God and not the Inner Light is the principium of faith. Voetius uses the word-pair externum and internum for Scripture, but stresses the external authority of Scripture; this authority is due to the divine origin of Scripture. The last question of the controversy with the skeptics regards the evidences of the authority of Scripture. “Can the divinity of Holy Scripture be proved to those who do not believe? We affirm with a distinction.”\(^{289}\) Voetius does not explain how this can be proved or which distinction should be made, for that was what the students were supposed to find out.

When Voetius discusses the controversy with the Roman Catholics he asks: “Does Scripture have authority, autopistia, *auvqenti*a in itself, through itself? We affirm.”\(^{290}\) This quotation shows that Voetius finds the term autopistia important enough for his students to mention in this elementary summary of the Reformed dogmatics. It also shows that for Voetius the terms authoritas, autopistia, and *auvqenti*a stand very close to each other. The autopistia of Scripture stands between the authority and the authenticity of Scripture, the second and third term explain the first; the authority of Scripture consists of its autopistia and this autopistia is its authenticity in se and per se.

---

\(^{287}\) The controversiae primi generis are either cum alienis a fide or cum Pontificis, aliisque heterodoxis. Voetius, Syllabus problematum theologorum: Quae pro re nata proponi aut perstringi solent in privatis publicisque disputationum, examinum, collationum, consultationum exercitii, Utrecht 1643, [21]-[22].

The next question runs: “Does this [authority] become certainly known to us and how then and from whence? Is this either through the church, or through the Holy Spirit or through Holy Scripture or really through Scripture and the Holy Spirit? We affirm the last.”

The authority of Scripture as the principium fidei can only be known to us through the cooperation of Word and Spirit.

The Syllabus shows that in the context of the seventeenth century the focus is shifting to other issues. Voetius for instance distinguishes between historical and normative authority, but denies that there is a distinction between historical and normative authenticity. The question whether the authority and authenticity of Scripture extends to the vowel points is answered in the affirmative. The Syllabus shows that Voetius held to a strict infallibility of Scripture and that his concept of inspiration comes very close to dictation. He denies that the authors wrote anything without the inspiration (instinctus) of the Holy Spirit and that they could err in anything. The method, the mode of expression, and even the style of Scripture are not to be attributed to the human mind, but to the immediate and infallible revelation of the Holy Spirit. This sounds stricter than what we have found in the Synopsis.

The term testimonium does not occur in the context of the authority of Scripture. In the chapter on the divinity and authority of Scripture, Scripture is simply stated as a principium of theology without reflection on the question how that authority is accepted by believers. Voetius does not deal with the relationship between the work of the Spirit and the authority of Scripture, or between testimonium and autopistia.

In the chapter on the perspicuitas of Scripture he does mention the work of the Spirit. “Can Scripture work faith and obedience in human beings without the internal illumination of the Holy Spirit and can it be heard, read, or understood fruitfully and savingly? We deny.” This shift of the work of the Spirit from the context of the authority of Scripture to the context of the perspicuity of Scripture is remarkable; it implies a shift in emphasis from the testimonium of the Spirit to Scripture to the illuminatio of the Spirit in the believer. The question is not on which foundation the authority of Scripture rests, but how Scripture is accepted in the right way. Does this indicate that Voetius separates the “objective” authority of Scripture from its “subjective” acceptation? We will have to look at his Disputationes Selectae before we can answer this question.

---

4.7.2 Faith and Human Reason

The first disputation in the collection Disputationes theologicae selectae deals with “Human Reason in Matters of Faith.” According to Voetius, there is a controversy both with the Socinians who state that reason should be used to judge the articles of faith and with the Jesuits who state that reason should not be used because only the express words of Scripture count in the discussion between Rome and Reformation.297 Voetius first makes a distinction between the objective and the subjective ratio. The first is the ratio in the abstract sense and the second is human reason as it is given in the image of God before the fall, as it is corrupted after the fall, as it is liberated through grace and finally as it is perfected in glory.298 The question rises whether the ratio is a principium of faith. Voetius says:

The principium of faith is twofold: either out of which or externum or through which or by which or internum. The first can also be called an objective principium, the second a formal principium. The first is the Word of God, the second the illumination of the Holy Spirit or the infusion of supernatural light into our mind. This external principium of faith must be first and αυτώπιστος and all the truths, articles or conclusions of faith must be primarily deduced from it and ultimately resolved by it.299

Then Voetius states that human reason is “the receiving subject of faith” (subjectum fidei recipiens) or “the instrument and elicitive principle (principium elicitivum) of faith and active knowledge,” because the proper place of faith is in the ratio and not in the other faculties of the human soul. Thus, according to Voetius, human reason in a certain sense is a principium of faith. The principium externum is Scripture and the principium internum is the illumination of the Spirit, but reason is the principium elicitivum, a scholastic technical term to denote by which principle conclusions are drawn out of other principles.300 Voetius concludes: “Human reason as the principium quod draws the conclusions of faith from the unique principium of the infallible Scriptures.”301 The truths of faith transcend reason, but this is because human reason does not discern them unless it is enlightened. This does not mean, however, that they are against reason as such; they are per accidens and not per se.

In that respect therefore faith and our theology can be called completely reasonable not because it proves its truth a priori with necessary arguments to those who deny the principia of the 298 Voetius, Disputationes Selectae I.1.2.

---

300 Cf. Aquinas, Scriptum super Sententis I, d.3, q.5, a.1, ad5.

301 “Haec tanquam principium quod conclusiones fidei ex unica infallibili scripturarum principio educit.” Voetius, Disputationes Selectae I.1.2. Muller gives some other examples for the discussion of reason, but he does not mention the idea of ratio as principium elicitivum or principium quod. Muller, PPRD 1², 394-395. According to Muller, the idea that reason is a principium cognoscendi theologiae is a development in late orthodoxy. Muller, PPRD 1², 306.
Christian religion, but because it proves its conclusions from the authority of Scripture by reasons deduced from Scripture to those who accept something of that what is divinely revealed.\(^{302}\)

Then Voetius turns to the other side; although human reason is an elicitive princípium quod of faith, it certainly is not a princípium quo or per quod or ex quo of faith. Scripture is the source of faith and the illumination of the Spirit is the cause of faith, while reason is the receptive psychological faculty in which faith finds its proper place.\(^{303}\) Sometimes Voetius calls the light of right reason or the capacity for argumentation the secondary princípium of theology, while Scripture is the primary princípium.\(^{304}\) Reason is not the foundation or norm or source of faith for the doctrines of the Trinity, of original sin, of the God-man Christ, and his satisfaction cannot be deduced from reason. For matters of faith we depend only on Scripture and for the act of faith only on the illumination of the Spirit. Voetius lists nine arguments to prove this point against the Socinians, such as the blindness of the unregenerate, the mysteries of theology and the limitations of the knowledge of the regenerate. Again he refers to Aristotle’s Posterior Analytics and the commentaries on Aristotle. “Human reason is not prior to, better known than or clearer than faith, therefore it cannot be its princípium.”\(^{305}\)

The term αυτόπιστος is crucial in Voetius preliminary remarks on the function of human reason in theology. Reason as the princípium elicítivum deduces the conclusions of faith from Scripture as the princípium externum through the illumination of the Spirit as the princípium internum of faith; only Scripture, the princípium externum or primarium, is αυτόπιστος. Voetius may have influenced Turretin at this point, but the interdependence of two texts is difficult to demonstrate.\(^{306}\) Turretin does not use the term princípium elicítivum for human reason.

---

302 “Hactenus ergo fides & Theologia nostrae tota dici potest rationalis, non quod à priori veritatem suam rationibus necessarió demonstrat apud negantes principia religionis Christianae; sed quod demonstrat conclusiones ex authoritate scripturae, & rationibus ex scriptura deductis, apud eos qui aliquid concedunt eorum, quae divinitus revelata sunt.” Voetius, Disputationes Selectae I.1.2.

303 In scholasticism the princípium quo is the basis for an event or effect, a causative principle, while the princípium quod is a passive principle that is acted upon. Muller, Dictionary, 246.

305 “Ratio humana non est prior notior, certior fidei; ergo non est ejus principium.” Voetius, Disputationes Selectae I.1.3.

4.7.3 Subjective and Objective Authority

In the arrangement of the subjects in the Disputationes theologicae selectae the disputation on “Human Reason in Matters of Faith” is followed by a disputation on “Scholastic Theology” and one on “The Extension of the Authority of Scripture.”

This disputation deals primarily with the distinction between the historical and normative authority of Scripture and with the authority of the Masoretic text, which, according to Voetius, was rooted in the work of Ezra. Voetius opens his discussion with the statement: “The divinity of Scripture or its divine and infallible truth and power with respect to us, is called authority or authenticity.” This underlines the fact that authority and authenticity stand close to each other as we have seen in the Syllabus. The fourth disputation on “The so-called Contradictions of Scripture” deals with some classic difficulties in the explanation of Scripture; next comes a disputation on the “Apostolic Creed” and then one on the “Church Fathers.” The doctrine of the authority of Scripture does not receive as much attention as would be expected in the opening of a series on Reformed theology.

The fifth volume of the Disputationes Selectae, however, contains five disputations on Scripture (Problemata aliquod de Scriptura). The term auctoritas only occurs in one of them. In the second of these five disputations, Voetius discusses the authority of Scripture. “For no other principle (principium) or external means can be imagined, by which it can be demonstrated a priori or with absolute certainty.” Although Voetius lists the auctoritas, auctoritas scripturae, auctoritas divina, and credibilitas of Scripture, the term auctoritas is preferred to auctoritas scripturae in the rest of the disputation. The meaning of both terms is almost synonymous for Voetius, but he loses sight of the axiomatic character of auctoritas. “The auctoritas and authority of revelation and of the divine Scripture so shine and gleam through themselves and from itself it showers such signs and tokens of its divinity at all sides [...] that it is impossible not to see it.” A little later he writes:

Neither can any other principium or external means, besides Scripture, be given or invented that is prior, superior, more certain (either in se or quoad nos) and clear, that it be fit to demonstrate the authenticity and auctoritas of Scripture so certainly and infallibly or that radiates light more evidently than Scripture does.

---

308 Muller, PRRD 2, 411.
309 “Divinitas Scripturae seu divina & infallibilitas ejus veritas ac potestas respectu nostril dicitur auctoritas seu auctoritas scripturae.” Voetius, Disputationes Selectae I.iii.1.
310 The disputation deals with the foundation of the authority of Scripture. “Unde sit & dependeat auctoritas Scripturae?” Voetius, Disputationes Selectae V.ii.
311 “Nullum enim alliud principium, aut medium externum hic fingi potest, per quod a priori aut certo certitudo & autoritas illa demonstretur.” Voetius, Disputationes Selectae V.ii.1.
312 Voetius, Disputationes Selectae V.ii.1.
313 “sic revelationis & scripturae divinae auctoritas, & authoritas per se lucet & radiat, & signa ac notas divinitatis undisque ex se fundit [...] ut non possint non videre.” Voetius, Disputationes Selectae V.ii.1.
314 “Nec ulla alii principium aut medium externum, a scriptura distinctum, eaque prius, superius, (sive in se sive quo ad nos) certius ac notius dari aut excogitari posse, quod aptum
Voetius distinguishes between the objective and subjective authority of Scripture and reserves the axiopistia for the first. The objective and subjective authority of Scripture are inseparable and the objective certainty of Scripture is guaranteed by the inspiration of Scripture while the subjective certainty is guaranteed by the illumination of the Spirit:

Just as the objective certainty of the authority of Scripture is nothing, unless it is inserted and engrafted by God alone as the real author of Scripture, so also the subjective certainty or the formal concept of the authority of Scripture is nothing for us, unless we are inwardly illumined and persuaded by God through the Holy Spirit. As Scripture itself, as the principium externum radiates by its own light, (without the intervening of any other principium or means of demonstration or conviction), is by itself and in itself άξιοπιστος or credible – so the Holy Spirit is the internum, supreme, first, independent principium, actually opening and illuminating the eyes of our mind, effectually persuading us of the credible authority of Scripture, from it, along with it and through it, so that being drawn we run, and being passively convicted within we acquiesce.\(^{315}\)

The objective certainty is a result of the autopistia – or in the words of Voetius the axiopistia in se – of Scripture and the subjective certainty is the result of the illuminatio of the Spirit that causes us to find rest (acquiescere) in Scripture. Both sides are connected because Voetius says that the Spirit works from Scripture, along with Scripture and through Scripture, nevertheless, the Holy Spirit as the principium internum is called supreme, first, independent compared with Scripture as the principium externum.

For this statement Voetius refers to the testimonies of Scripture.\(^{316}\) He also says that only God is able to work in the mind and will of human beings; the external principle as such is not able to effectuate sure faith and the true reception of the authority of Scripture and therefore the internal persuasion of the Spirit is necessary.\(^{317}\) If Scripture depends on the authority of the church this results in circular reasoning, for then the church is trustworthy (άξιοπιστος) because Scripture says so and Scripture is trustworthy (άξιοπιστος) because the church says so.\(^{318}\) Finally, it follows from the \(^{315}\) Ut certitudo objectiva autoritatis scripturae nulla est, nisi a solo Deo scripturae autore ipsi indita atque insita: sic certitudo ejusdem subjectiva, seu conceptus formalis autoritatis scripturae nobis nullus est ... lumine radians (nullo alieno interveniente tanquam principio aut medio demonstrationis aut convictionis) per se & in se άξιοπιστον seu credibile est, & aptum natum active convincere, uon minus quam lumen solis per se & ex se visible est seu aptum natum illuminare: sic Spiritus Sanctus, est internum, supremum, primum, independens principium actualiter mentis nostrae oculos apierens atque illuminans, & credibilium scripturae autoritatem ex ea cum ae per eandem efficaciter persuadens, sic ut nos tracti curramus, & passive in nobis convicti acquiescamus. Voetius, _Disputationes Selectae_ V.ii.2. We discussed this quotation above in our summary of Heppe, Cf. Heppe, _Dogmatik_, 22. Cf. Heppe, _Reformed Dogmatics_, 25-26.

---

\(^{316}\) Voetius refers to 1 Cor. 2,12, 1 John 2,27 and John 16,13; 6,44,46.

\(^{317}\) Voetius, _Disputationes Selectae_ V.ii.2.

\(^{318}\) “Quare credis ecclesiae aut Papae testante de autoritate scripturae? Quia scriptura dicit Papae aut ecclesiae testimonium esse άξιοπιστον? Et quare credis scripturaequam άξιοπιστοι? Quia Papa aut ecclesia dicit scripturam esse άξιοπιστον.” Voetius, _Disputationes Selectae_ V.ii.2.
doctrine of grace that the assent to the authority of Scripture is a result of the grace of the Spirit either regenerating and sanctifying or illuminating in a common way.\footnote{319}

4.7.4 Summarizing Remarks

For Voetius \textit{autopistia} is a theological “technical term”; it stands between the authority and the authenticity of Scripture. The authority of Scripture consists in its \textit{autopistia} and this \textit{autopistia} consists in its authenticity \textit{in se} and \textit{per se}. Sometimes he prefers the term \textit{axiopistia} to \textit{autopistia}. This place between authority and authenticity illustrates that the meaning of the term is formalized; it does not denote the way in which Scripture is accepted through the work of the Spirit, but is an attribute of Scripture. Moreover, in the \textit{Disputationes Selectae} the term \textit{αὐτόπιστος} has shifted from the doctrine of Scripture to the field of the \textit{principia} of theology and is used for the differences between the several \textit{principia}.

In Voetius’s \textit{Syllabus} the \textit{testimonium} is not discussed in the context of the authority of Scripture, but Scripture is simply called the \textit{principium} of theology without reflection on the question how its authority is accepted by believers. The \textit{illuminatio} of the Spirit finds its place in the context of the \textit{perspicuitas}. The shift in emphasis from the \textit{testimonium} of the Spirit to the \textit{illuminatio} of the Spirit indicates a shift from the “objective” authority of Scripture to the “subjective” acceptance of this authority.

Voetius also calls human reason (\textit{ratio}) a \textit{principium} of faith, although merely an elicitive principle. Faith transcends reason, because reason does not discern the truths of faith unless it is enlightened, but these truths are not against reason.

Voetius seems to go beyond the representatives of early orthodoxy on some points. His definition of inspiration is stricter than that of the \textit{Synopsis} in that Voetius not only denies that the authors of Scripture could err in anything, but also attributes the method, the mode of expression, and the style of Scripture to the immediate and infallible revelation of the Holy Spirit. This stricter view may partly be due to the new controversies within Protestantism for instance on the vowel points of the Masoretic text, but it can also be a symptom of a desire to safeguard the authority of Scripture against the developing critical attitude.

Finally Voetius not only distinguishes between a \textit{verbum externum} and a \textit{verbum internum}, but also calls Scripture the \textit{principium externum} of faith and the illumination of the Holy Spirit or the infusion of supernatural light into our mind the \textit{principium internum} of faith. He repeats this in one of his disputations on Scripture; Scripture is the \textit{principium externum} and the Holy Spirit is the \textit{principium internum}. This \textit{principium internum} is even called supreme, first, independent compared with Scripture. Both \textit{principia} guarantee the objective and subjective authority of Scripture. Only the \textit{principium externum} is \textit{αὐτόπιστος}. The objective certainty is a result of the \textit{autopistia} of Scripture and the subjective certainty is the result of the illumination of the Spirit. The application of the terms \textit{externum} and \textit{internum} to the \textit{principia} of faith seems to be a new development compared with early orthodoxy, where the term \textit{principium} was reserved for Scripture and not used for the \textit{verbum internum}.\footnote{319 “necessario sequitur, ultimam analysin hujus assensus de autoritate scripturae esse in gratiam spiritus sive regenerantis & sanctificantis, siva ad minimum communiiori auxilio illuminantis.” Voetius, \textit{Disputationes Selectae} V.ii.2.}
The question whether the conflict with Cartesian philosophy influenced Voetius in his tendency to distinguish between Word and Spirit as objective and subjective principles of faith and theology can only be answered in a more detailed study. Voetius may have emphasized the objectivity of the authority of Scripture to counterbalance the contemporary subjective tendency. He makes a sharper distinction between externum and internum than his orthodox Reformed predecessors and applies the terminology to the principia of faith. The autopistia of Scripture and the testimonium of the Spirit that were so closely related for Calvin, are separated, or at least sharply divided by Voetius. The autopistia of Scripture is a given fact that can be proved objectively, while the testimonium is interpreted as a subjective illumination of the Spirit. Perhaps Voetius has internalized more of the Cartesian philosophy than he would be willing to admit. Both Descartes and Voetius stand on the brink of early modernity, which is characterized by the discovery of the human subject. In the dichotomy of subject and object Descartes jumps into the subjectivity of his ego cogito ergo sum while Voetius clings to the old certainty of the autopistia of Scripture as the principium externum of faith. To safeguard this certainty he interprets it objectively.

4.8 Conclusions and Theological Considerations

In this chapter we have analyzed the development of Reformed theology in an hermeneutical way. This implies a rejection of the separation of the historical and theological approaches. Our historical interests, for instance in the combination externum-internum, are related to our theological quest for the ground of the certainty of faith. The hermeneutical approach should make us careful not to step in the trap of drawing prejudiced historical conclusions or presenting an over-simplification of the complicated historical development. The concentration on the term αὐτόπιστος helps avoiding the confusion of different aspects of theology with different stages of a historical development. We evaluated four aspects of the theological development of Reformed orthodoxy. First of all we looked at the influence of the developing debate with the Roman Catholicism of the Counter-Reformation. We found that the autopistia of Scripture was essential for the position of William Whitaker in this debate. The polemical context influenced the meaning and the use of αὐτόπιστος. The term was not only used as an adjective, but also as a substantive and so the autopistia of Scripture became one of the attributes of Scripture. The second aspect was the institutionalization of Reformed orthodoxy at the universities. We saw what happened to the autopistia of Scripture in the sphere of the academic education in the example of Franciscus Junius. The shift from the adjective to the substantive autopista was formalized in his theology through the use of the scholastic and Aristotelian distinction of the four causes. We also saw that in the several disputations the relationship between the evidences and the testimonium was explained in various ways. Moreover, the innovative discussion of theologia in his prolegomena created a structure that led to a shift of the autopistia from the doctrine of Scripture to the discussion of the nature and principia of theology. Junius discussed autopistia in the disputations on Scripture, but in later Reformed theological systems the term moved to the introductory disputation on theology. The discussion of theologia as a science created a place in the theological system for the autopistia of Scripture as a logical necessity rather than a confessional statement. All sciences have self-convincing principia, therefore if theology is a science and if Scripture is the principium of theology, Scripture must necessarily be αὐτόπιστος. Thirdly we studied the influence of two internal controversies: the Arminian Controversy and the reaction of Francis Turretin to the theology of Saumur. Although both Arminius and Gomarus used the term αὐτόπιστος, they had a different intention. The term gained a different meaning in a different context. For Arminius the autopistia of Scripture safeguarded individual liberty. For Gomarus the autopistia of Scripture safeguarded Scripture against human corruption. Likewise in the Synopsis of Purer Theology the autopistia of Scripture safeguarded the Reformed doctrines and therefore it was interpreted as a general characteristic of Scripture that could be proved to unbelievers by a detailed argumentation; even the faith of believers was seen as a result of the notae or criteria. In his reaction to Louis Cappel Turretin connected the autopistia of Scripture especially to the original text of the autographa. The autopistia of Scripture as the ultimate source of authority logically led to the integrity of the copies of the text, which God in his providence must have guarded. The fourth aspect lay in the context of the early Enlightenment. Gisbert Voetius used autopistia as a theological “technical term,” but preferred axiopistia. The emerging Enlightenment may have influenced Voetius when he called human reason a principium of faith, although it only was an elicitive principle. The distinction between Scripture as the principium externum of faith and the illumination of the Spirit as the principium internum of faith ran parallel to the emphasis on the human subject in early modernity. Voetius emphasized the objectivity of the authority of Scripture to counterbalance the contemporary subjective tendency, but in his rejection of subjectivism he made a sharper distinction between externum and internum than Reformed orthodox authors before him.

Although this summary is oversimplified, it shows how theological and historical contexts influenced the meaning and use of αὐτόπιστος. The shifts were rather differences in nuance than radical changes, for often the previous uses of the term still occurred in the later writings. Nevertheless, the use of αὐτόπιστος illustrates a changing concept of the authority of Scripture.

Calvin introduced the term αὐτόπιστος as a confessional statement; in the polemic with Rome autopistia became an attribute of Scripture; in the academic setting the autopistia gained the status of a logical necessity for the principium of the theological science; in the Arminian Controversy the objective aspect of the autopistia was emphasized over against subjectivist abuse of the term; in the controversy with Saumur the term was connected to the autographic text of Scripture; and, finally, in the confrontation with the emerging Enlightenment the autopistia of Scripture counterbalanced the autonomy of human reason.

The externum-internum terminology also begs for a theological evaluation. Calvin does not speak of a testimonium internum as the subjective counterpart of the external authority of Scripture. In early Reformed orthodoxy the two terms refer to the church as the external means of grace and to the Spirit as the internal author of grace. Whitaker uses the word-couple in connection with testimonium for the institutional testimony of the church and the personal testimony of the Spirit. Junius divides the testimonia into the internal testimonium of the Spirit and the external testimonia of Scripture and the church. For Alsted the distinction verbum internum and verbum externum runs parallel to the inspired verbum (ἐνδιάθετος) and the enunciated verbum (προφορικός). He divides the second into the written verbum (ἐγγραφον) and the unwritten verbum (ἀγραφον) and then applies the distinction to the realm of faith. The verbum internum once in the heart of the authors of Scripture has become a verbum externum in Scripture and this verbum externum again becomes a verbum internum in the hearts of believers through the Spirit. The verbum internum is the testimonium internum.

In early Reformed orthodoxy the term principium is reserved for Scripture. The high orthodox Reformed theologians Voetius and Turretin call Scripture the principium externum of faith and the illumination of the Holy Spirit the principium internum of faith, but only Scripture is αὐτόπιστος.

Our historical research leads to six fields of interest for our theological evaluation; in the final chapter these issues will be discussed and related to Calvin’s concept of the authority of Scripture and to the theological positions of Benjamin B. Warfield and Herman Bavinck.

1. Calvin places the authority of Scripture at the beginning of the Institutes as a prolegomenon. Nevertheless, he states that the proper place to deal with the testimonium of the Spirit is in soteriology. Most Reformed orthodox writers deal with Scripture in one of the first loci of the theological system, following Calvin’s decision. Usually Scripture comes after the discussion of the nature of theology and before the discussion of the existence and attributes of God. We have seen that the autopistia of Scripture shifts from its original place in the locus “On Scripture” to the first locus “On Theology.” This goes together with the transformation from a confessional statement into a logical starting point of theology. This leads to the question whether this development is inherent in the decision of Calvin to place the authority of Scripture at the beginning of the Institutes. Some early orthodox Reformed writers dealt with Scripture in the context of ecclesiology, because the doctrine of Scripture was dominated by the polemic against Rome. Whitaker placed the authority of Scripture in the context of the prophetic office of Christ. This begs for a theological evaluation and for a consideration of the implications of transferring it to Pneumatology or Christology.

2. We will have to look at the definition of the autopistia of Scripture. We have seen that in Reformed orthodoxy the adjective αὐτόπιστος is transformed into a substantive, ἀυτοπιστία or τὸ αὐτόπιστον, and this shift indicates that autopistia has become one of the attributes of Scripture. Moreover, the term is primarily used in the context of the principia of theology. The autopistia of Scripture follows logically from the fact that Scripture is the principium of theology; it is understood as a logical necessity. There is no unbroken line from the self-convincing sense of Scripture in the Reformation to the Reformed orthodox identification of Scripture as the principium cognoscendi theologiae. There is continuity, but the differences between both concepts of autopistia may not be harmonized and the development from a confessional statement to a logical necessity may not be overlooked. We will have to take this development into account for our theological definition of the autopistia of Scripture.

3. We are interested in how the autopistia, the testimonium, and the evidences are exactly interrelated. The relationship between the evidences and the testimonium is explained in various ways by the different authors and sometimes even by the same author as in the case of Junius. In Reformed orthodoxy there is an increasing apologetic emphasis on the objective notae of Scripture. Next to this increasing emphasis on the objective side stands a tendency to connect the testimonium of the Spirit with the evidences as the means by which the Spirit demonstrates the autopistia of Scripture to believers. The Spirit gives power (vis) to the arguments or even works faith through the divine notae of Scripture.

4. The term αὐτόπιστος in Reformed orthodoxy stands in the wide range of the questions of determining the canon as well as settling the authenticity and integrity of the text. Only the original Hebrew and Greek texts are αὐτόπιστος and not the ancient translations. Turretin acknowledges the importance of textual criticism, but rejects the use of the Septuagint and of conjectural emendation, because this leads to uncertainty. We will have to face the theological question what happens to the autopistia of Scripture if the integrity of the text topples and consider how the autopistia of Scripture is related to textual criticism.

5. There is an inherent tension in Reformed orthodoxy between an appreciation of reason as natural gift or even as the main faculty of the soul and a depreciation of reason as a potential enemy of faith and an instrument of human hubris. Thysius states that whatever is contained in Scripture either expressly or by a valid inference is true doctrine; everything that can be logically derived from Scripture is true. Turretin, however, warns against the danger of placing human reason in the citadel by allowing conjectural emendation of the text. Reason is not a guide to the truth, but a guide from the truth of Scripture to Christian doctrine and practice. The same tension appears when the notae of Scripture are rejected as the foundation of faith, but accepted as conclusive for unbelievers and as the means by which the Spirit convinces believers. There is an inherent tension in Reformed theology at this point.

6. The use of externum and internum is very complex. The way in which the meaning of this distinction has shifted during this period seems to be interrelated with the rise of early modernity. The historical question concerning how the subject-object dichotomy has influenced the relationship between the authority of Scripture and the work of the Spirit has only been touched on and is not yet fully discussed in this study. Still the impression arises that the interpretation of the autopistia as an objective characteristic of Scripture and of the testimonium as a subjective reality in the individual is influenced by the early modern emphasis on the individual human subject.