The research for this thesis was carried out during three stimulating, fun, and all too short years working at the Netherlands Institute for the Study of Crime and Law Enforcement. It is hard to put my finger on why working at the NSCR was so enjoyable, so I will simply thank all of my former colleagues, from Catrien Bijleveld, the inspiring yet approachable director, to the regulars at the lunch table, and to the behind the scenes staff who keep the cogs turning. Of course, particular thanks go my promotor Arjan Blokland, professor at Leiden Law School, and co-promotor Victor van der Geest. Arjan, thank you for taking a leap into the relative unknown when you asked me to be the candidate on the Research Talent proposal you were preparing. I have learnt so much from you; from the methodical way you approach a problem, from the way you are always able to pinpoint the crux of the argument, and from your relaxed approach to deadlines. Victor, I always enjoyed your calm presence during our meetings and your positive, constructive feedback on my work. I would also like to thank Stacey Bosick for the incredibly rewarding experience of writing the ‘instability’ paper together. My thanks go to the CONAMORE team from Utrecht University for allowing me to use their data and advising me on Chapter 5.

I joined the TransAM project just as data collection was wrapping up. Needless to say, this thesis would not have been possible without the hard work of the many people who researched, coordinated, interviewed, tirelessly tracked down respondents, and data-cleaned for the project, the majority of whom I never met. I am extremely grateful for their efforts and to the TransAM respondents themselves, without whom this thesis really would not have been possible. I am indebted to them for taking the time to participate in the study.

Many of my colleagues from the NSCR have become friends. To you all, thank you for the WhatsApp chats, the coffee and ice cream breaks, and the fun nights out. Two of my former colleagues turned friends get a special mention. Marleen, I could not have wished for a better roommate. I think we found the perfect balance of work and chat. Doing this PhD would have been a lot harder and a lot less fun without you tapping away on the other side of the desk from me. Holly, I could not have wished for a better friend. I am so pleased you could make it back to be my PhD bridesmaid.

My parents I thank for allowing me to explore who I wanted to be, for letting me boomerang back to the parental home, for supporting me financially over the years, and for not questioning my experiments with different career paths. Now I have finally transitioned into the adult roles of spouse and parent, I think we can say that you have successfully supported me from emerging to full adulthood. Which is not to say your support ends here.
Finally, to my husband, Dick, goes the biggest thanks. You have supported me in many ways throughout the years. We’ve been through various twists and turns in our time together and I could not think of anyone more perfect to share the next journey into parenthood with.
